him repent of the manner of his reception; so that embracing him, he asked pardon for his incivility: And to repair his fault, he would needs have him lodge with him: But Sir, whilst he was there, he uttered a thousand excellent things, which made his capacity apparent: for Anacharsis being altogether for Monarchical government he shewed a Million of inconveniencies in any other; and said boldly in a full Assembly (when he saw publique affairs consulted upon by a multitude) that he thought it very strange, that wise men should propound things concerning the publique good, and fools decide them, hinting at the abundance of young men who over-voted the old in all great Assemblies, and who for want of old experience, are unable to reason justly in the manage of great affairs. In short Sir, Solon found Anacharsis so admirably knowing in all things, that he consulted with him, and relied upon his judgment in things of highest concernment, and made him known unto all his friends; Truly, said Chersias, it was Solon who writ unto Bias, what Anacharsis was: And it was he also (said Diocles) who caused Periander to invite him unto that famous Feast, at which, except my self who by their favor was permitted, there was none but persons of most illustrious fame: and in|deed, this Feast for the excellency of it, was called the Banquet of the seven Sages, not comprehending the rest who were there, because indeed it was prepared only for them; As Diocles said so, one came to acquaint Cyrus that the Princess of Armenia was coming, so that desiring to do her all possible honors, he went to meet her at the door of his Tent, where he received her with much civility, telling her that if she had any service to com|mand her, she did him much wrong not to command him to come & wait upon her. Since it would not become me Sir, said she & smiled, to command him, who comands most of all Asia, I thought it more fit to come my self to tell you that I have heard newes of Spitridates and Tigranes. Onesile had no sooner said so, but Cyrus being very impatient to know what they had done since their departure, and where they were, he desired her to tell him. So that this Princess acquainted him how since Tigranes embarked from Gala'ia, with the Prince Spitridates to follow Phraartes who had carryed away Araminta, they wandered continually from Sea to Sea, & could hear nothing of her, until at last landing at Cholchil'es, they understood that Phraartes had carried Araminta unto the Dominions of Thomi|ris, and that Mandana was there also, and that he would march with his Army towards that part of the River Araxes which limits the Massagettes on that side. And Tigranes who writ all this unto me, further added, that as soon as their Equipage which was in making, was ready, they would come unto you Sir: and Tigranes told me further, that he would think himself obliged unto me, if I would come unto this place whither of my self I am come.

Page 88 Cyrus hearing this, seemed to be much joyed that Tigranes and Spitridates would so shortly be in his Army: For truly Madam (said he unto her) I do value those two Prin|ces as good as ten thousand men, and I do not doubt but I shall deliver Mandana, since they will fight for her: They would think themselves very happy Sir, replied she, if they can contribute any thing towards the delivery of so famous a Princess; at least I am able to answer for Tigranes, that he desires nothing more zealously, then to have the glory of serving you Sir.

After this, Cyrus acquainted Onesile how he had sent to Thomiris; and since he knew Onesile to be of a very illustrious house, originally a Greek Republique, he presented those three Grecians unto her, with whom he was talking before she came in, and pre|sented them as men who were esteemed by all the Grandees of Greece: So that this Prin|cess being very civil, she received them with the sweetest grace that was possible; the fair Telagene who was with her, did no less, and they were all three so happy in this discourse, that at the very first meeting they got the esteem of this Princess, and her lovely Cozen. In the mean time, it being dinner time, Cyrus told Onesile, that he left it to her choice whom she would be pleased to have dine with her, not excepting himself. I have already told you Sir, replied she, that it becomes not me to prescribe any thing unto the Con|querour of Asia. 'Tis true Madam, said he unto her, But I answered alwayes that you might command me any thing. Thus both Cyrus and Onesile did so vie civilities, that they could not excel each other.

But whilst they were talking, most of the company there being withdrawn out of re|spect, there was none remaining but Indatheres and those three Grecians, who dined with Cyrus, Onesile, and Telagene, and two other Ladies of Quality who followed that Princess in her travels: So that the last thing which Cyrus talked on with Diocles, Menel|siphiles, and Chersias, being the Banquet of the Seven Sages, as soon as they did rise from the Table, he turned towards them: Though there be not so many Sages at this dinner (said he unto them) as at that Feast in Corinth; yet I believe we had one advantage which they had not. Since these Ladies who are here, replied Diocles, were not there, nor you neither Sir, doubtless there wanted the greatest ornaments of the world: But Sir, I assure you, that Feast was more gallant then you imagine it, for it was not only an Assembly of grave Phylosophers, but also a most pleasant meeting of Ladies, for the late Queen of Corinth was there, she who reigns at this day also, and the Princess Eumetis, who o|therwise is called the Princess of Lindes, she was also there with the wise Cleobulus her Fa|ther. Moreover, there was an Ambassador from the King of Egypt, called Niloxenus; the intimate friends of Periander were there also; the merry Esope, who at his departure from Lidia came to Corinth, he was there; and indeed this Assembly was so mixed, that there was enough to find in it all that would satisfie any humor. The truth is, added Menesiphiles, all manner of things was discoursed upon, questions were argued upon all imaginable subjects; Policy, Morality, Oeconomy, Pleasures, Riddles, and Musique were treated upon, abundance of pleasing rallary, a million of questions in matter of love were put, many an almorous history was related, the adventure of Arion was told, who also was there: Indeed Sir, this Feast deserved the Fame it hath gotten over all Greece: For my part, said Onesile, I have had the greatest desire in the world to know all the particulars of it, since a Greci|an once coming to Artaxates told me somthing of it, but not being present, he told me only as much as filled me fuller of curiosity, but nothing to satisfie me: Since so Madam (said Cyrus) you speak it in a happy hour, for Menesiphiles, Diocles, and Chersias were all three present at it, and are able to satisfie you: Now Sirs, said he, I know not how time can be better employed, then in hearing the sayings of these Sages of the world, and of the most meritorious Princesses upon earth: For truly Madam, the Princess Cle|buline is a person composed of wonders, and the Princess of Lindes hath been described unto me so amiable, that the time will be very well spent in hearing their wits. After this, Onesile importuning Diocles, Menesiphiles and Chersias to acquaint them with all that was done and said at this famous Feasts, these three friends did in civility dispute amongst them|selves, who should have the honor to relate it. But in conclusion, it being agreed that Menesiphiles should begin it, and that Chersias should end it, the first began to speak in these terms, addressing his Speech unto Onesile, according to the orders he received from Cyrus.

The Banquet of the Seven Sages.

BEfore I begin the description of this famous Feast which the Greeks do call Simposia, it's fit I tell you Madam, that though I have related it a hundred times in my daies, yet I cannot deliver it in the same terms, though I never did vary from truth in any, when I told unto men of knowing capacities I never mentioned any thing but what passed among the Sages, and of things suitable to their understandings, but never told them of any pas|sages in the Garden amongst the Princesses, Chersias, Esope and my self, whilst the Seven Sages were discoursing in high points of Phylosophy with Anacharsis, Niloxenus, and some others. But since I am now to make this relation unto you, I think it convenient not to omit the pleasing passages of the day preceding this Feast; give me leave therefore to tell you Madam, that since nothing was then talked on in Corinth but of these famous men who were met there at one time, and of that Ambassador from Amasis; who they said was sent unto the Seven Sages of Greece, every one was fill'd with curiosity to know what he would ask of them from the King his Master: Great talk was also of an extraordinary foresight in one of those Sages called Chilon• who smelling something of the Lacedemoni|an severity, being of that Country, he was nothing of Salons humour, nor of the other Sages, who suited their Philosophy according to the mode of the world; as for Chilon, he would have all the world conformable unto him: So that squaring all the actions of his life by the straight rule of reason, he was as careful as he could be to converse with none but such as he esteemed, and none else; and to prevent his being in any other company, whensoever his friends invited him to eat at their houses, he would first ask who would be there, before he would make any promise, saying, That a man who travelled at Sea might be in the same Ship with men who pleased him not, as well as a valiant Souldier might be in the same Tent with a Coward, because necessity of travelling and encamping with such as Fortune brought together, did allow it without any imprudence: But the case was otherwise in going to Feasts, and the man was out of his wits that would venture him|self wilfully amongst a miscellany of all sorts of several people: So that according to his humour and custome, when Periander invited him to be at this famous Banquet, Chilon asked before he would promise to make one, who would be there? As they named unto him Thales, Solon, Pittacus, Bias, Cleobulus, and Anacharsis, he was very well contented, and was well pleased also that Esope was to be there; but when he was told there would be some Ladies also, he refused to go, and had absolutely absented himself, if they had not been named unto him; yet seeing there was to be but three: The first Melissa, Wife to Periander: The second, the Princess her Daughter; and the third, the Princess of Lindes; and that these three were the Wives and Daughters to as wise men as himself, he promi|sed to be there. As for Diocles, Menesophiles, and my self, he did us the favour not to refuse our company: Yet since he had never spoken unto the Princess of Lindes, Esope understood that he inquired of her very inquisitively, he was full of his Rallary all that evening with the Princess of Lindes, playing upon the severity of Chilon in the wittiest and pleasant manner in the world, affirming boldly, that nothing in the world was more dan|gerous then being over-wise: For my part (said he and smiled) it plainly appears that I am not of Chilons humour; at least, the Fable which I composed of the Country-Mouse, which came to sup with the City-Mouse, makes it appear: I am not so severe as this Lacedemonian: But (said Eumetis then unto him) your Country-Mouse do so much re|pent the leaving of her Achorns whereon she lived, and her coming for better cheer, when she heard the door open where the City-Rat feasted her self, that I cannot tell whe|ther Chilon or you have greater reasons for your opinions, and whether he have not more reason to be at home in quiet, then come unto such ill company as mine: However, I should be very angry with my self, if I should be the cause of his not being at the Feast to morrow; for I have heard say, that though he be severe, yet he is a most excellent man; and though he be melancholy, yet he is sensible of joy: Since now it is very late, replied Cleobuline, he cannot see you before the Feast: Yet I have heard say, replied she, that Chilon never judges upon any thing by reports, nor ever trusts any but himself Then it were requisite (replied Cleobuline) that the Princess Eumetis did write some piece of wit, which may be shewed unto him, and that she compose one of those pleasant Riddles which she used so happily to invent, and send it unto him, that he may know she has as much wit as himself.

Page 90 As soon as Cleobuline said so, all the company concurred in her opinion, and moved Eumetis to compose a Riddle: So that Esope, who had alwayes a Table-Book about him, did take one out of his pocket, and offered himself as Secretary unto that Princess, who being excellent good at Rallary, told Esope, that she would let him be her Secretary for once, provided he would let her be his another time: So that seeming to study a while, she writ in Esops Table-book a Riddle which formerly she had made, and which none e|ver yet saw, but in lieu of addressing it unto Chilon, she addressed it unto Cleobuline. Then after she had written it in Esopes Table-Book, she gave it unto Esope, and he did read these words in a distinct voice.

A Riddle unto the Princess of Corinth.

What is it?

Which flatters not Kings more then Beggars.

Which serves to correct the faults of others, yet knows them not.

Which is Dumb, and yet gives Counsel.

Which when, in the right is not believed, but when it flatters, is alwayes cre|dited.

Which one part of the world makes use of, to conquer the other.

Which is multiplied by its own ruine?

For my part (said Esope and shrugged his shoulders) I must confess that I better un|derstand the language of my Crows, then the words of the Princess of Lindes, though their voices be nothing so charming as hers; and I confess to my shame, that I cannot resolve this Riddle: And I will not say for my self, as I made my Fox say, when he said, That the fruit which he could not reach was too green, and therefore would not reach them: So I will not say I will not unty this Riddle, but ingeniously confess, that I can|not, but am confident that it would puzzle all the Seven Sages of Greece: Really Esope (said the Princess of Corinth, and took the Table-Book) it is a great shame unto you not to understand this Riddle, since you could understand that which none else could without you: Since my shame is a glory unto the Princess Eumetis, said he, doubtless you will rejoyce at it: I must confess it (replied She) but I should rejoyce much more, if I could have the honor of finding that out which you cannot: However, replied Eu|metis, I would not have you find this Riddle out, until Chilon hath tryed what he can do, since I writ it only to get his good opinion of me: If you please Madam, said Esope, I will shew it unto him immediately, for I know he is in Perianders Chamber. At first Eu|metis was against this, but Cleobuline being of Esopes opinion, She bad him shew it un|to Chilon; yet he would not, until after all the company confessed they understood it not: However, Esope went, and found Chilon in Perianders Chamber, unto whom he said he had some business of consequence to impart: He being used to the pleasant hu|mours of Esope, and expected some diversion of wit from him, he hearkened unto him, though he had then with him Solon, Tha|s, Chilon, and Pi|tacus: So that after Periander had given him leave to speak, he told Chilon, that knowing he loved not to go unto a|ny Feast, unless he were acquainted with all the Ghes, and not being ignorant how he had never spoken unto the Princess of Lindes, he had brought him one of her Riddles, to the end he might see some of her wit, and not refuse her company the next day. After which presenting the Riddle unto him, and Chilon as severe as he was, loving Ralla|ry, at the desire of Periander he began to read it aloud; after which, he confessed that he did not understand it, and that if it proved as true as it was obscnre, it was an admi|rable good one: For my part, said Periander, I say as much as Chilon: And for my part added Thales, I should be less troubled in observing the course of the Sun, and regula|ting seasons and years, then I am in finding out this Riddle. As for Solon, he found it out as soon as ever he heard it, but being naturally civil towards al|Ladies, and Gallan|try, not being incompatible with his Phylosophy, he would not make it known that he had found it out, purpose to glad the Princess of Lindes that her Riddle was undiscovered: So that Esope by the order of Periander returned to bring back the interpretation of this Riddle: For till then, said he, it cannot with Justice be commended, since it is not enough to be good, but it must be understood also, and be found true in every part, and that when the thing is known, one shall admire one did not understand it. So Esope re|turned, Page 91 and told Eumetis She had puzzled all the Sages, and that none of them did under|stand it: Since such things as these (replied the Princess of Corinth modestly) are som|times found out more by chance then wit, perhaps I have done that which some more able then my self could not: And truly Esope (said She) if you will cast your eyes upon that glass which you see upon the Table, I am confident you will find that it does flatter the Princess of Lindes no more then the Slave behind her, and therefore it was just to say it does not flatter Kings any more then Beggars; and that it's true, it doth correct the faults of others, yet knows them not, at least I am sure it hath done me a good office a thousand times, yet knew not what it did: It is also as true (pursued She) that this Mirror Counsels, but speaks not, since it hath told me that Carnation colours better bel|comes me then Green. It is also as true, that a Mirror is alwayes believed when it flat|ters, and not believed when it does not. Moreover, the Princess of Lindes, that half of the world makes use of a Mirror to conquer the other, could not be enough commended; for all Beauty who would make Conquests, do it by the advice of their Mirrours, and add fresh Graces unto their Beauty; so that She could not express her thought more nobly: And if you will see how the last part of my Riddle holds true (said She and smiled, you may let my glass fall, and find twenty glasses, and twenty Eumettises for one, so that it might well be said it was multiplied by its ruine. Really, said Esope, I know not who merits most commendations, She who made this Riddle, or She who found it out: For my part, said Eumetis, the Princess Cleobuline deserves most, for the interpretation is more ingenious then the Riddle it self: However it be, said Esope, I will go presently and tell Periander, that the Princess his Daughter hath done more then he could do, and indeed so he did; but he expounded the Riddle unto the King of Corinth after his own mode, to wit Ralla|ry; for as soon as Periander saw him: Well Esope, said he, What's that which flatters Kings no more then Beggars? It is a thing Sir, said he, which let's the Princess of Co|rinth, see every day when She dresseth her self, that She is the fairest Princess in the world, and which sometimes lets me see that I am the ugliest fellow upon earth. As soon as Esope had said so, Periander, Solon, Thales, Pitticus, and Chilon began to laugh, and confess that the Riddle was most ingenious: After which, Esope began to commend the in|terpretation which the Princess of Corinth had made upon it, and to ask Chilon whether he thought Eumetis worthy to be at the Feast with him: Doubtless She hath a most rare wit; (replied he) But Esope, I hope you can assure me, that the Charms of her soul will please as well as the Beauty of her wit: After this, Esope broke out into a hundred pleasant ex|pressions, twitting at the severity of his Phylosophy, and the excess of his prudence; and afterwards he returned to the Princesses whom he did entertain so plesantly, that it was late before they retired.

However, the next morning Periander went unto the place where he intended to make this great Feast: For to the end, it might be more pleasing, he would have it out of the Town, at a place called the Lecheon Port, neer the Temple of Venus: And indeed it was the most beautiful place in the world: First the House was a most magnificent structure, and had a huge vast Hall Arched, and fit for so great an Assembly: Then there is a most rare Garden, and a most pleasant Grove along the Sea side, with such goodly walks, that a fitter place could not be found again in the world, to entertain such a company as Periander intended, and to pass away a day in pleasure. But since he was to treat men that were wise in the most Sovereign degree, he would not use all his magnificence, left he should offend their moderation: The truth is, he banished superfluity, but had abun|dance, kept order, and was neat: Also he had excellent Musique, and after dinner, he had a Masque of Dancing for a repast. But to do all things with splendor, he sent a Coach unto every one of his invited Chests, and he received them at the Gate of the house where he was to treat them, as if he were only a private man, declaring unto them all as they came, that he would not be a King that day; and that the last Act of Authori|ty which he would use all that day should be to command them, to look upon him as their friend, and not at all as the King of Corinth. Had I given such a King unto my Frogs (said Esope and smiled, speaking in a low voice) they had not disobeyed him, when he displeased them. Ha Esope (replied Periander and smiled) Though you had made me King of your Frogs, yet they would have been Rebels: But you do know the nature of people so admirably well, who use to murmure both against clement and severe Princes, that you with much reason do merit to be this day a companion unto them that Greece hath most admirable.

Page 92 As Esope was ready to answer, the Queen of Corinth, the Princess her Daughter, and the Princess of Lindes came in: Presently after, Solon, Chilon, and all the rest of the com|pany assembled, for Thales, Pittacus, Bias, Cleobulus, Anacharsis, Niloxenus, M <...> |les, Chersias, a man of Corinth called Cleodemus, Ardales that famous Musitian, and my self were there before.

I shall not now tell you Sir the first complements which all these illustrious persons used, since by such things they cannot be distinguished from ordinary men; nor will I describe the Feast unto you, it will be sufficient I tell you that all was exquisite, the Musique ex|cellent, the Dances admirable, and the discourse ravishing: The truth is, there was such a spirit of joy which did so spread it self through all the company, and which did much banish al|l seriousness, yet this jollity had nothing in it which was not worthy of those whereof the company was composed; the company played upon Esope, and he played upon them after his usual rate of rally, and Anacharsis himself was so good at it, that no Grecian was better at rally then he: The Princesses also did much contribute to the pleasure of this mixed conversation, which changed subject according to the humour of those who spoke; and Periander would have the Princess his Daughter with her own hand give Chaplets of Flowers unto every one of the Ghes, according to the custom of that place. In the mean time, since this was not an assembly of Gallants, but of Sages only, Cleobuline and Eumetis were not dressed as if they were going to a Ball, yet so hand|some, that I never saw them better then that day. But Madam, as soon as they were all risen from the Table, Niloxenus the King of Aegypts Ambassador, who was sent only to consult with the Seven Sages upon certain Propositions which the King of Aethiopia made unto his Master, he changed the discourse: For after he had read that Kings Let|ter, and Bias had given a pleasing answer unto the odd Proposition which the King of Aethiopia made unto him, and which I shall not repeat, because all the world knows it, they fell upon more serious things: They began to examine what would render a King most glorious: Solon said, If my memory fail not, that a King cannot render himself more glorious then in communicating his Authority: Cleobulus said in his turn, that he was a wise Prince who never trusted unto any: Pittacus said, that the greatest glory was for a King to make all his Subjects fear him; and Chilon said, It was most glorious to love ho|nor above all. As for the rest of the Sages, I must confess Sir, I do not well remember what they said: But as for Esope, I do remember very well he said, that King was al|wayes most glorious, who had the valour of a Lion, the subtilty of a Fox, and to his Subjects the love of a Pelican to her young ones: And for my part (added he with an admirable action) I most use my Beasts and my Birds as well in my comparisons, as in my Fables.

But after every one had answered something to the rally of Esope, they fell into dis|course concerning Republicques: And Thales said, That to govern a Commonwealth well, men must be kept neither too poor, nor too rich: Anacharsis said, That the best way was to make virtue and vice the only distinction of the Inhabitants: Pittacus said, That Commonwealth was in best order where the virtuous commanded, and the vicious had no Authority: Cleobulus said, That Commonwealth was happiest where the people feared Infamy more then the Law: Solon said, They were best, where those who were not oppressed, protected them who were, and prosecuted the oppressors as their own Enemies: Bias said, Where the people feared the Law as a Tyrant: Chilon said, Where ambition was banished: And Periander affirmed, that there the State was happiest, where the publike Interest of the Country was above all private interests: After which, they discoursed upon several other theams; and indeed, after they had talked of Monarchies and Republicques, they discoursed concerning the Government of private Families, and Chilon maintained, That to be the best governed, which most resembled the state of a Monarchy, whose Authority is in one only: For my particular, said Esope, I take most delight in being like to the King of Bees, to wit, sole Master of my house: But I must conf|ess, that when I was a Slave, I had rather have been in my Masters house, as Ants are in theirs; to wit, with equality in all things: After which, the Ambassador of Amasis falling upon the most sublime Subjects, they began to define what Time, what Light, and what Truth was, and to speak of Death, of Fortune, and of the Gods. So that the three Princesses having in modesty no mind to meddle in such discourse, they retired, and went to walk in that pleasant Grove I told you of, which was by the Sea side. Thus they left the Seven Sages with Anacharsis, Niloxenus, Cleodemus, and Diocles, to talk concern|ing Page 93 the most sublime Sciences. In the mean time, Esope naturally loving the company of Ladies better then mens; and Chersias and I being obliged to wait upon the Princesses, and to speak truth, since we were not so wise and knowing men as those we left, we were not sorry to wait upon these amiable persons: Our company also encreased, for many in Co|rinth being full of curiosity to see these Seven Sages of Greece together, and also to see that famous Scithean who was so highly spoke of, the Princesses, with Perianders leave, gave orders to those who kept the Gates of the Garden, after Dinner to let in ten or twelve Ladies of Quality. So that the Princesses in their going out of the Hall seeing them, these Ladies followed them into the Grove, Cleobuline assuring them, that She would let them see those illustrious men whom they so longed to know; but since they were then very busie, they must stay till they went out of the Hall. After which, go|ing to this Grove, they came to a place, which towards the Sea side resembled a Half-Moon, having round about it seats of Grass, and these seats being at the feet of Trees, a great number might sit very convenient, since the place was shaded. These Princesses then being come to this place, they sat down, and caused all those to sit also who were of Quality befitting their presence; the rest either stood behind, or else lay upon the ground. As for Aesope, he stood behind the Princess Eumetis, leaning against a Tree, at the root of which was a seat of Grass, upon which She sat with the Princess of Corinth. As for Milissa, She was separated from them, and was talking in private with two of the new-come Ladies So that it was a pleasant sight to see the head of Aesope between the heads of those two fair Princesses: Yet certainly, as ugly as he was, he made one de|light to look upon him; for maugre his ugliness, there was such a kind of subtilty in his physiognomy, and all his actions were so ingenious, and so pleasing, that I assure you he pleased as much by his person, and well by his way of speaking things, as by the things themselves. As for Chersias and I, we stood before the Princesses, with some o|thers which they had let enter with them, and the Ladies I spoke of.

As the beauties were in this posture, one of the Ladies began to say she was exceeding sorry that a Prince called Basilides was not then at Corinth, another grieved that a gallant named Myrinthus was absent also, wishing he had seen that which perhaps they shall ne|ver see again, it not being possible fortune should assemble so many great men together. For my part, said the Princess Eumetis, I am vexed at the Egyptian Embassadors being here this day, for though he be a well accomplished man, yet I wish he had been absent since if he had not come in with his questions, the conversation had not been so serious; for I must confess that I am very much pleased with the reading of many things which I do not like in conversation, perhaps it is an ill grounded niceness of minde in me, but for all that, I would he had in lieu of talking of time, of light, and of truth, propounded some questions of gallantry unto the Sages: As for Solon, replied I, I assure you he would have pleased you upon such a subject, especially if he had talked of love. As for love, replied Cleobuline, I confess I shold not care to hear it spoken of before such pieces of gravity; for though it be a passion as well as the rest, and though it stands in as much need of the Sages help, as any of the other passions, to regulate the minds of such as are possessed with it: yet certainly none is able to speak upon that subject hansomely, unless he were in a capacity either to love, or to be beloved. I beseech you Madam, replied Chersias, did never any tell you that no wiseman could ever be in love? For my part, (said Eumetis to the Princess of Corinth) I wish Anacharsis were in love with you, that he might not return into Scithia, but stay always in Greece: were he in love with me, and so old as he is, replied the Princess of Corinth, you would never desire he should stay here; for if he did, certainly he would not be so wise as he is: to speak rationally (said the Princess of Lindes) love is a ridiculous thing in an old man: And more in an old woman, replied Cleobuline: Doubtless it is, answered Eumetis, but yet this is the difference, since the he lover is obliged unto more ceremony then the she loved, he is put to the necessity of appearing more ridiculous. Eumetis had no sooner said so, but all the company concurred with her, and an old lover was blazed in his ridiculous collors; for my particular said one of the Ladies, methinks I see him a thing out of fashion, one that will walke as if he were young, yet do what he can, is old and walks so: he will be talking of such matters of gallantry, which none can understand; he cannot tell how, and yet he will talk of love, and can talk of nothing else. I would fain know, said Eumetis, whether there be any Lady that desires to hear such a one talk? If there be, replied Cleobuline, questionless it is to gear him: But yet (added she and turned towards Aesope) what say you unto all this? I say Majdam, Page 94 replied he, as my Wolfe said unto the Shepherds who were eating mutton in their Cottage, (what a noise would be made, if I should do as you do.) I am confident Majdam, added he, that you know how to make the application; for if I should say as much as you do, I should presently be branded with the name of a maker of biting and Satirical Fables; but because you are great Princesses, you are allowed to devour a poor man alive, with more cruelty then the Shepherd's devoured the mutton. I think (said Eumetis and laughed as well as all the company) that you interest your self in this old mans business, because you do intend to be in love your self: Never question it Madam, replied he; but you do not consider that I have a greater advantage then others have; for since I was an ugly fellow at fifteen, and can be no worse at a hundred, I shall not be so ridiculous as another, though I were in love with a leg in my grave. Since you are perswaded (and with reason) replied Cleobuline, that the pleasingness of your wit will get you more love then your person can, certainly you have more priviledge for being long in love then any other. But added Eumetis, since we talk of love, and talk unto Aesope, I must needs ask, whether he be still in love with the famous Rhodophe, whom they say is now in Egypt? No Madam, said he unto her, I am not in love, since the brother of the famous Sapho is: and I wish that all the beasts I ever made speak, may devour me, if ever I do love her again. If it be really true you do not love her, replied Cleobuline, you need not make such cruel imprecations against your self; for I am fully perswaded one cannot love one person twice, and that it is easier to love twenty one after another, then to love one, with whom he was quite broken off. This Rule, replied I, is not so general but will admit of an exception in a friend of mine, which loved one woman twice, with equal flames. But are you sure, replied Chersias, that your friend does think so himself? for perhaps he never loved but once, whom he thought he loved twice, and happily never left loving her; for sometimes anger makes such a bluster in the heart of a lover, that love lies lurking in it, though he know it not, and the truth is, he often thinks he hates, when he loves, and thinks he has forgotten her whom he always thinks upon: So that when I say it never happens that one loves one person twice, I mean that he did really cease to love her, and not leave the least spark unextinguished, which may revive again; for if it do, the fire never went out. For my part, replied Cleobuline, I do not think there is any such impossibility for one to love the same person twice, as you imagine, for though a cinder be extinguished, and has been so long, certainly it will take fire sooner then if it had never been lighted. And so I conclude, that the first Love makes a disposition for a second, and that it is more easie to love one whom he loved before, then another: For my particular Madam, replied Chersias, I know by experience it was the case of a Nephew unto the wise Bias, who was as bravely a qualified man as any in the world, and as far from erecting shattered Altars as ever any was, or from Sacrificing one heart twice unto one and the same Divinity. This is so nice a question, replied the Princess Eumetis, that to imitate the rest of the company whom we dined withal, we must argue and examine as they do the highest and difficult points in Philosophy: If an example will make good my opinion, replied I, I will easily prove that one may twice love one and the same person: Nay, if an example will do it, replied Chersias, I shall get the better of you, and make it evident, That one cannot begin again to love a Lady, after he had once absolutely given over loving her. As Chersia said so, Mellissa rising up to walk, and becking to one whom she would have follow her; the Princess, and all the rest of the Ladies stayed still with Chersias, Esope, some others, and my self. So that the Princess of Lindes, who was pleased with this question which was worthy of her curiosity, obliged Chersias and me to relate the two examples of which we spoke, and afterwards to make good our opinions with the best reasons we could produce; adding afterwards, that the major Vote of the company should decide the controversy: With all my heart, said Cleobuline, But methinks it requisite, said Eumetis, that Aesope have a double voice: If so, said he, I shall give them on his side, who holds that one cannot love one person twice. Fie Aesope (replied Eumetis and laughed) you give your opinion too soon, since you will pronounce Judgment before the cause be pleaded: I have been so frequently familiar with some certain babbling Birds (replied he and smiled) that you need not wonder if that be my fault. But truly Madam, I am so fully perswaded of what Menesiphiles will say, and that one cannot love one person twice, that I thought it not amiss to declare at the beginning, what I knew I should say at the end, maugre all the reasons of Menesiphiles. However it be said Cleobuline, I pray lend your audience, unless you will have me think you less Page 95 wise then those Birds, who carry stones in their throat to stop their garrulity. After this, the two Princesses having commanded Chersias and me to relate our examples, and afterwards our reasons, it was resolved that I should first relate the History of my friend, which I did in these following terms, addressing my Speech unto the Princess of Lindes by the command of Cleobuline, as I do address it now unto you Madam, by the command of that great Prince who is present.

The History of PHILIDAS; and of ANAXANDRIDE.

Since it is not convenient at this present Madam to make any long relation, I will not mention who were the Fathers of those whose stories I am to relate, only assure you, that Philidas and Anaxandride, whose adventures I shall relate in a few words, were both born at Megares, and were extracted from the most illustrious Families of that famous Town; and fortune hath not only made them equal in their births, but also in their merits and persons, for Philidas is as handsom as Anaxandride is fair, and Anaxandride hath as fine a wit as Philidas, though his be high and admirable. Moreover, there is a marvellous Sympathy in their humours, and their age also is proportionable, for Anaxandride is at this present not above nineteen years of age, and Philidas twenty: Besides all this, be pleased to know, that they have seen each other from their cradles, their houses joyned, and their Fathers were intimate friends. After all this Madam, I assure my self, that when I shall tell you how Philidas fell in love with Anaxandride as soon as he was capable of Love, and how she did not reject his affection, you will think him the happiest Lover in the world; and I can assure you, that as long as his first passion lasted, he met with Roses, and no prickles in them, but tasted all the sweets of Love without any bitters, for he was as much esteemed as he did esteem, and I think no less loved then he did love; he saw her, and talked with her when he would; their Parents saw their inclinations, and did not cross them; and if any thing kept Philidas from motioning a marriage with his Mistress unto his Parents, it was only because he would not think of Marriage as long as an Uncle whose Heir he was to be, was absent; and this Uncle being gone to travel, and not to return until a year was over, Philidas thought upon nothing but how to divert his Mistress. In the mean time, this condition of his was too happy and too tranquile, and this hope, which never had any mixture of fears, did so glut the mind of Philidas, that he hoped for the enjoyment of his Mistress without any delight, and he was so sadded with her sweetness and civilities, that he became insensible of all her favours, not but that he loved her still, and saw her often, but thinking himself sure of her affection, and that he never needed to ask that question, he therefore had nothing oftentimes to say unto her; and indeed he has told me, that he has been fain to talk of news, and of meer indifferencies when he hath been alone with her, because his Love gave him no new subject of discourse: Indeed Madam, this quiet hope, and this equality of happiness, together with the certainty of being loved, did by degrees infuse such a lue-warmness of affection into Philidas, that being to go into the Country, he was more joyed at his going to see the Country drest in her fresh green garment, then he was sorry to part from his Mistress. However, though there was a great Sympathy of humour between Philidas and Anaxandride, yet there was a notable difference in their hearts upon this occasion; for as the love of Philidas lessened, that of Anaxandride increased; and to vex her more, when he came to take his leave, she perceived he spoke with too much indifferency; yet since that was not a fit time to quarrel, she shewed no sign of discontent at the alteration of his mind: So that he left her without any quarrelling, and without any vexation ever since he first fell in love with her; yet since he asked leave to write unto her, and obtained it, he did write accordingly to her, but his Letter was only a bare description of the Country, and his delights in sitting under a shade, and hearing the Birds sing in a wood; yet at the end of his Letter, he wished her where he was but it was in such a faint manner, as made it evident, that he wished her there more to hear Nightingals, then to talk to her of any Love matters: Yet Anaxandride being perswaded, that it was dangerous to quarrel with an absent Lover, as long as he had a minde to keep him, she writ unto him, as if there were no alteration in her heart: But all this her goodness working its ordinary effect in the soul of Philidas, he waited without any impatience for the day on which he was wont to hear from Alexandride, and I received it from his own mouth, That his love to her did so cool, that he received a Letter from this fair one Page 96 in the morning, and never did read it till night when he went to bed. Philidas being then thus coldly indifferent, after so much hot affection as chance would have it, his father writing to him that he should go unto Salamine about some business, there he saw a great Beauty called Timoxenes, and the Father of this fair one being to go and dwell at Megares, he was very glad to contract friendship with a man of his Quality: So that in a few daies Philidas had all possible freedom in his house. But Madam, as the too much sweetness of Anaxandride, and the too much happiness of Philidas, had glutted and cooled his affection, so the fantasticalness of Timoxene caused his inconstancy to her. For Madam he found in her all things contrary to the other; for certainly, never any was of a more unequal and peevish humour, nor who loved better to wrangle with her Lovers, and fall out with her friends; for it was the common talk, Timoxene said such and such a thing, Timoxene said such a one told her so, Timoxene complains against such a one, or such a one complains against her; Timoxene is fallen out with him, or <> with her; and the truth is, Timoxene out of her perverse inequality of humour, did so intangle things, and trouble both her self and all the world, that she banished almost every one from the place where she was, for she made every one to fall in love with her, or else sowed seeds of division between those who intended to contract most solid friendship, all this out of her unequality of humour: For some daies she would tell whatsoever was told her for the greatest secret, and on others on the contrary; her best friends could not scruce the least sillable out of her; and sometimes she would care so little what she said, that she would speak against her own interest. However, Timoxene was amiable and loved; but the truth is, she had more lovers then friends, yet as fantastical as she was, she won many to love her, and though she was most unequal in her humours, yet it may be said; she did what she could to anger love, but not to ruine it, for her fantasmes lasted not long, and when she was in a good humour, there was not a more charming, cherishing, and sweeter person in the world. Indeed sometimes one would swear, she was ever all sweetness and pleasiug: So that in this good mood a man would give her more power over his heart, then he was able to recal again.

Timoxene being as I have described her, she was in one of those pleasing fits, when Philidas first saw her. So that since his love to Anaxandride was extinguished by her too much sweetness, and his too much happiness; her Idea did not hinder him from thinking Timoxene very fair and infinitely witty. Moreover, he learned that very first day, how she had many Lovers; and he knew also, tht she was one whose affection was the most difficult in the world to be gotten, and the hardest to be kept when it was gotten. But Madam, without further aggravations of this fantastical adventure, let me tell you, that Philidas being weary of being happy, or to say better, not resenting his good fortune, because he was too much accustomed unto it, he sought to make himself miserable in thinking to find felicity, for he saw Timoxene so often, that he fell in love with her, and by consequence left loving Anaxandride; So as it cannot be said he loved her still, since the greatest sign of not loving a person, is to love another. But to tell you truly, Philidas was no sooner the lover of Timoxene, but he was rouzed out of that amorous Letlhargy, in which the sweetness of Anaxandride had lulled him, for from the very first day he began to love this fantastical person, he was as full of jealousy as love, and as full of anger as jealousy: However, that which in all reason should have lessened his passion, did encrease it, and he became as fast fettered in the chains of Timoxene, as ever he was with Anaxandrides.

But as Fame commonly carries such news, so that the fair one at Megares quickly heard that her Lover was perfidious, and that he was fallen in love at Salamine: So that since she really loved him, she was incredibly sad at the news, yet it was a very glorious, sorrow; for resolving to slight him who slighted her, she endeavoured all possible ways to quiet her own minde: But to tell you truly, the hatred which succeeded her love, did put her to as much pain as her love had done. In the mean time, since as I told you before, the Father of Timoxene intended to go and dwell at Megares; so he went thither with all his Family, and Philidas returned with him. And as it is the custome of the place, that when any strange Ladies come thither, all the Ladies of the Town use to visit her. So Anaxandride went to Timoxene with her Mother, and to perform a piece of civility unto a person who had taken the heart of her Lover from her, she was so unfortunate as to find Philidas there; yet I have heard her say since, that she took more pleasure in this visit then she expected, for since she had no desire to find Timoxene fair, her imagination Page 97 did so flatter her passion, that she fancied Timoxene otherwise then she was, for she thought her hair too red, though it was the palest fair in the world, she thought her colour too high, though it was well composed, her eyes she thought too sharp, though they were rather languishing, her lips pale though vermilion, and her making ill-favoured, though it was very handsome: So that ascribing doubtless as much unto her own beauty, as she detracted from her Rival, she fancied her a thousand times less fair then she was, and believed her self to be fairer then ever she did; at least, she told me, that She thought so: But the thing most observable was, her joyes in being perswaded that Philidas had no excuse for his inconstancy, and that he was a loser by his change: And truly (said she one day unto me) I verily believe I should have died with spite, if I had not found Timoxene much inferior to me in every thing. Methinks (added she) that spite hath so altered my heart, that Philidas is not so handsom as he was when he loved me; and I wonder that I should be then so mad, as to think him amiable: But now Philidas, seems unto me to be another man, methinks his mind not so noble, his wit duller, his action more forced, his very accent as changed, and methinks he hath gotten such a kind of clownishness at Salamine, as it is a shame unto all Islands. The truth is, added She, I thought my old Lover so little pleasing that day, his Mistress so far from lovely, and my self so far above them both, that I went away from this visit less troubled then ever I imagined. But after all this (pursued she) though I had no desire that Philidas should still love me, yet still I was vexed strangely that he should love Timoxene. In the mean time Madam, out of a resentment of honour, Anaxandride resolved never to twit Philidas with it, but contented her self only with shunning to meet him, and to treat him very coldly in what place soever she found him: And indeed so she did for a long while. But Madam, since Timoxene had not changed her humors in changing places; she was the same at Megares, which she was wont to be at Salamine, and made there much more disorder, for being there unknown, all the men and women were sooner trapped, and the half of her life being very amiable, they kept her company as a person whom they all esteemed, and doubtless they saw her in the good vain, but were ignorant of her fault, that some daies She could not conceal any thing: So that it being usual in those who would contract friendship with any new comer, to acquaint them with all the news of the Town, to the end She may not be any longer a stranger; there were some men and women who did her that office, but were ill requited as well as Philidas, for in one of those daies when she could not conceal any thing She knew, She set all the the Town so together by the ears, that never the like was heard of, nor so many jars in so short a time. The worst was, since She used often to hear all things without right application, She confounded them by her repetition of them

Thus she caused to be told unto Philidas what another did say of him, and to that other what Philidas said of him: So that quarrel upon quarrel did arise; but the strangest thing was, Timoxenes did no more care for any of those quarrels She had caused, then if She had no hand in them at all, and She knew so well how to make her own peace, that She did easily reconcile her self to all; but the worst was, She could not so easily reconcile others. Philidas being excellently accomplished, and a man of a clear spirit and wit; as amorous as he was, he saw that Timoxene had some ill qualities amongst her good ones, but being of an humour to surmount all difficulties, it may well be said, that the Prickles made him think the Roses sweeter, since the inequality of Timoxenes did for a long time augment his passion.

But at last, this inequality produced a very vexatious effect, for now her inequality had got into the thoughts of her heart, and she was not only sometimes merry, and sometimes said, but those whom She loved to day, were not sure to be so to morrow: So that She did not look upon Philidas neither as her lover, nor her friend, but looked upon another more favourably then upon him: So that after Philidas had tried alwayes to get again into her favour, he would see whether jealousy would work upon her: So that making a shew, as if he would renew with Anaxandride, he endeavoured for an occasion of seeing her, and went unto her house with one who was a Cozen unto that fair one, who was much her friend. But Madam, the strangeness of this adventure was, that when Philidas returned to Anaxandrides house, he was extremely in love, and extremely jealous of Timoxene, and had no tenderness at all to the first: The reason why he would seem to love Anaxandride rather then any other, was, because it was most likely. Moreover, he alwayes found her so sweet, that he thought he could quit her when he pleased, and Page 96 (1 page duplicate) Page 97 (1 page duplicate) Page 98 nothing would happen of it but as formerly; yet he found it otherwise, for since Anaxandride was noble as well as sweet, She resented the inconstancy of Philidas so bitterly, that had it not been more in love to her self then him, She would have made it appear: But when he came to her again, and would have spoke in private with her, he was amazed when he found her upon other terms then he expected, for he believed that Anaxandride would have received him with all joy, at any time he pleased; yet She spoke so very sharply unto him this first visit, that he plainly saw himself absolutely lost, and that it was a harder matter for him to regain the heart of Anaxandride, then the heart of Timoxene: So that as his love was cooled by the facility of her being happy, so She began from that day to rekindle it, by the difficulty he found in being so again: The truth is Madam, though I cannot understand the reason of it, yet it is most certain, that the sharpness of Anaxandride began to work that in the heart of Philidas, which her too much sweetness had taken away: Yet he did not pass from one extremum to another in an instant, but in a very few daies he left loving Timoxene, and began to love Anaxandride again with more hot flames then ever he did: Then did he remember his happy condition formerly, and thought himself the more unfortunate, and he thought himself so much too blame for being insensible of his happiness, that it made him much the more miserable.

On the other side, Anaxandride, though She did not now love Philidas, yet in point of glory She could not chuse but be glad to see him fettered in her chains again: and finding that rigor was the way to raise his passion, She shewed it in so high a manner, as was enough to make love die in any heart but his. In the mean time, the worse Anaxandride treated him, the more was he in love with her, and more repented of his inconstancy: Pray Sir (said I one day unto him, seeing him melancholy) Why did you leave loving Anaxandride without any cause? And why did you renew it without reason? For truly when you quitted her, She was as lovely as ever; and when you repented, She was no more amiable then when you cast her off; and therefore I have good reason to ask you why you did leave loving her, or else why you began to love her again? I left loving her, replied he, because I was so accustomed to be happy, that I did believe I could not be more; and I began to adore her again, because I was weary of being miserable, and knew that I could not be happy without her: But Sir, replied I, She is the very same She was when you loved another, and the same She was when you forsook her: Ah Menesiphiles, (said he unto me) I would it were true that Anaxandride were the same She was when I forsook her. No no, She was then sweet, but now cruel, She did then love me, but now hates me: I must tell you Sir, (said I then unto him and laughed) this difference doth not seem to me very fit to cause love, but it had been more reasonable to have continued loving her when she was kind, and when She loved you, then to begin loving her again when She is cruel, and hates you: I must sadly confess all this (said he unto me) But alas, since I am not Master of my own heart, what would you have me do? Yet I find it some sweetness, to think that Anaxandride would not have hated me, but because I did not love her, and must hope, that as She passed from love to hatred, so She may pass from hatred to love again: Had you fallen in love with any other, replied I, and that after you had loved Anaxandride and Timoxene, you had loved a hundred, I should not have wondered so much, as that you should love Anaxandride again. I know, said I, That one may fall out with a Mistress, and renew again: I know that believing her persidious, one may hate her, and afterwards finding her to be innocent, may begin to love a new; but I must confess, I cannot conceive, that having left Anaxandride without any cause, it can be possible you should ever love her again: Yet truly so it is (replied he) That never any man loved any woman more then I do her, and I do now hate my self as much as I do love her. When I consider upon the happiness I have foolish <...> lost, and upon the uncertainty of ever regaining it again, I think my self the most miserable Lover that ever breathed; other Lovers do only desire such favours as they never tasted, and therefore know not the sweetness of them; but the case is much more miserable with me, since I do desire a happiness which I have enjoyed, the greatness whereof I know: But Sir (said I unto him) you found such small happiness in the enjoying of it, that I know not why you should so earnestly desire the fruition again: I desire it, replied he, because now I know better the price of what I have lost, then I <◇> when I enjoyed it.

To tell you Madam that Philidas loved Anaxandride twice, is not enough to prove th<...> Page 99 one may love one and the same person twice, unless I tell you also, that Anaxandride did love Philidas twice also. But certain it is, that this revived Love did strive so violently to reconquer the heart he lost, that at last Anaxandride ceasing to hate him, did begin again to love him, and at this very hour do love with so much tenderness, that they are to be married within a few daies. Thus Madam I have furnished you with an example, that one may love the same person twice; and certainly there is more probability, that one should begin again to love her whom formerly he found amiable, then to love a fresh Mistress. Though there be much delight to be taken in hearing you speak (said the Princess of Corinth unto me) yet I must needs interrupt you: for I do conceive it fit before you give your reasons, that Chersias relate us an example opposite to yours, to the end that arguing afterwards upon both, the question may be better cleared, and the dispute more pleasing. Since what the Princess of Corinth said was very reasonable, Eumetis and all the company approving of it, silence was imposed upon me; and Chersias related his promised adventure: So that after all the company had renewed their attention, Chersias began in these terms.

The History of AGLATONICE, and of IPHICRATES.

Madam,

BEfore I begin the adventure which I am to relate, I conceive it not impertinent to our purpose, that I acquaint you with the manner of living in our Court, lest you not imagining the Town of Prienes to be such a one as it is, you should suspect the truth, when you see me introduce so many gallant persons in my relation: Therefore Madam, be pleased to know, that the wise Bias, who governs our state as chief head, hath made it so famous as little as it is, that it is considerable unto all our Neighbour States, and I dare boldly say, that of so many famous Greek Colonies, which passed into Asia, and there rendered themselves potent, there is not one which hath in such purity preserved the politness of its original, as ours. Moreover, the wise Bias having no children, he hath looked upon a Nephew of his as his Successor. This illustrious Nephew, whose name is Iphicrates, being a most admirably accomplished man, he hath rendered our Court full with men of excellent parts; for as the Uncle did attract many knowing men, so the Nephew by the example of his valour, hath drawn many brave men thither, and by his generosity many generous men.

As for our Ladies, I can assure you confidently, that few Asiaticque Towns have more fair ones, or more amiable; but that which makes the Court compleatly gallant is, Bias hath a Niece, who as rarely accomplished as Iphicrates, is yet not more then She, though She be not his Sister, for She is Daughter unto a Sister of Bias, and he a Son unto his Brother; it is at her house where all the men of Quality rendezvous, both all the Ladies, and all the wits and gallants. Moreover Madam I can assure you, that the Court of Policrates is not more gallant then ours, and one cannot find more diversions at Millete or Lesbos, then at Priene. Give me leave to tell you further Madam, that Iphicrates is not only rarely accomplished in respect of his valour and Spirit, but also because he is the most sincere man alive. Moreover, his person doth extremely please, for he is of a handsom stature, a good behaviour, and his greatest Enemies cannot charge him with any fault: 'Tis true, that his sincerity causes him sometimes to speak things a little drily; but for all that, he is esteemed by all the world, and loved by all those who know him except of that person, whom of all the world he most desired to be. After this Madam, it is requisite I tell you, who this fair and unjust person is of whom I speak, be pleased to know therefore Madam, that Iphicrates after many years absence; returned unto Priene one evening when there was a Ball kept at the Princess of Lanthos house, Niece unto Bias, and as one of his age never uses to let slip such an occasion, he made himself ready in all hast to go unto this meeting, which doubtless was worthy of his curiosity; for I never saw all our Ladies more fair, then they were that night, since there was not one ill dressed; and indeed one amongst them, who was most knowing in such things confessed, that they never had a more glorious meeting then this, for it had not the pressing croud of great feasts; nor was it one of those petty Assemblies, where the men have no choice of Ladies to dance withal. Moreover, the Hall was as light as day, and the Musique was in an excellent humour.

Page 100 Iphicrates then being entred into the place where they danced with all the gladness of a man who found such diversions, the first hour of his arrival: he went to the end of the Hall, where he saw three or four of his ancient friends, talking with some Ladies who danced not at that time. So that being extremely glad to see them, a thousand civil complements passed amongst them: The Princess of Lanthés, for her particular seemed to be much joyed at his return, and all the gallants who were dancing, made signs either with hand or head, that they longed for the end of the dance, purposely to tell him that they were glad of his return. But after the first civilities were over, Iphicrates had the liberty to view all the beauties of the Ball, and found one amongst the rest very lovely, whom he could not remember he had ever seen at any meeting before he went from Priene, and the truth was, he was in the right; for she was then so young when he went away, that she never went to any Balls: and so it chanced that he never saw her in her infancy; So that wondering to see her, he asked me who she was, I being one of those who was next her? and certainly it was no wonder that this Lady whose name was Aglatonice should raise his curiosity, she being one of the most charming beauties in the world: her composure was so noble and handsome? her Air so gallant and free, that though she was a brown beauty, yet she dimmed the lustres of all the fair beauties in Priene. Doubtless there was those who had many features, and as good as hers, and perhaps better; but there was not one who could be truly said a more perfect beauty, since none did compareably please so much as she.

Aglatonice being as I tell you, Iphicrates asked me (as I told you before) who she was? and whether I ever saw her at her own house? I suppose (said I unto him after I had told her name) that you would never ask this last question, but because you intend to be acquainted with her; but let me tell you Iphicrates (added I) Aglatonice, is a most dangerous person to be seen. I know very well, replied he, that such a beauty as she cannot be seen without some danger: Though that be true as you mean it is, replied I, yet that is not my meaning: What do you mean, replied he? I mean, said I, that this Lady who is so infinitely lovely and born to be loved, is one of the least loving creatures that is in the whole universe, as those say who think they know her best; but for my part I am perswaded they do not very well know her, and that there are several ways to penetrate her heart which they never found out. I pray, said he unto me, do me the favor to give me the Character of this Lady: should I give it without flattery (said I and smiled) you would never fall in love with her, though I should with all give her a thousand commendations: I pray do then (said he and smiled as well as I) for I am much mistaken in my self, if I have not already some light inclination in my heart to love her: I shall then tell you (said I unto him) that though Aglatonice be a Lady of an infinite wit and spirit yet of all that come unto her, she makes no distinction between men of mean parts, and men of highest accomplishments, nor between them and such as are of no qualities at all: so that I assure you, Aglatonice as virtuous as she is, yet never put back any adorer. And yet the world cannot say she is light; but she has found out an art of having a thousand lovers, and never denies any without being further taxed then to be a lover of pleasures and gallantry in general, and cannot to this hour be accused of loving any gallant in particular: Also there is always so great a croud of servants about her, as I cannot tell how to mention them; She will allow all to look upon her, and to sigh, nor will she forbid any to love her; so that she has always an infinite number of Rivals about her, who because one is not favored more then another, they live lovingly together without any quarrels, and almost without any hatred, and as long as the eyes of Aglatonice does not put any difference between them, they do not envy one another. Since then I must be miserable if Aglatonice repulse me (replied Iphicrates and laughed) you make me very glad for it is some satisfaction to be sure not to be treated ill at the first: 'Tis true, replied I, but it is a sad story that after ten years courtship, you cannot hope for any more <◇> from her, then you had the first day: and to be upon no better terms with her, then a hundred others, who have neither merit nor handsomeness in them. But it is possible (said he) that such a one as she should suffer her self to be loved by such as are altogether without merit? I protest unto you Sir, (said I unto him) I know some who love her that have no merit at all: and I do protest further, that she has lovers of all sorts, even from the Philosopher, to the fool, and from the valiant man even to the very varlet. Though only out of curiosity, replied <◇>, yet I pray carry me unto her tomorrow: unless by great chance (said I unto him) this curiosity will cost you very dear; Page 101 for though I have told you enough to keep you from loving her; yet I am confident, that unless you do love some other, you will love her; for she will please you above any other and more then any but her self can. So that since you are of a temper quite opposite to hers, you will be if I be not much mistaken, the most miserable man alive, if you should fall in love with her. You set her forth in such a rigorous Character; replied he, that I cannot see any such causes of fear: how Sir, said I unto him, do you not think it the most cruel thing in the world to love one who will confound you with a thousand others? and from whom you can expect no more then what you find the first day; for she will harken unto all: but she will answer none so kindly as to render them happy; nor so sharply as to make them despair. However, said he, see her I must, and you will do me a favor if you will carry me unto her to-morrow.

This Sir, was the first discourse I had with Iphicrates concerning Aglatonice, unto whom he could not speak that night, though he would; for she had no sooner done dancing, but ten or twelve were at her feet; and they no sooner came off, but as many more took their places. But Madam, not to spend time in trivials: I carried Iphicrates the next day unto Aglatonice, who received him with that gallant and universal civility which she shewed unto all her visitants: So that since she had the best grace in the world in every thing she did, and since it was impossible but she must please, he was charmed with the sight of her, and he parted from her more in love, then all they he left behind him: yet he did not then tell me as much; but I plainly perceived it, and fearing he should be too far engaged, I used all my arguments to dissuade him, though I could say no worse of Aglatonice, then what I had before: for the truth is, she is one of the most rarely accomplished women in the world: yet Madam it was in vain for me to attempt hindring him from loving Aglatonice; for I understood since, that this love had its cause from the Stars, against which all reasons were too weak. And indeed, had it not been so, Iphicrates had not loved Aglatonice so long; but would have left off, as soon as he saw the horrible injustice she did him, and that you may know it, it is requisite I acquaint you with something that proceeded it. Be pleased to know then, that Iphicrates after his first visit, went afterwards by himself to Aglatonice, and went so often, that at last he could go no where else. Yet it is not easie to understand why he should: for this Lady who never in all her life refused any Adoration, or any Adorer, did not accept of that declaration of love which Iphicrates made her; but on the contrary found so much scorn in her eyes, and such neutrality and faint indifference in her answers, as surely had choaked his passion, had he not been in that condition he was. But his heart being already too far engaged, to retreat upon the first repulse, in lieu of cooling his love became more hot: and as till then, he loved her only by inclination, now he loved her with resolution, and determined to oppose all that opposed his happiness. At the first, he found some advantage in being worse treated then a thousand others, and he thought the reason was because he was more feared then any other: The truth was, he flattered himself as one that would continue loving her, and indeed as one who could not chuse: yet sometimes her harshness to him, did almost drive him into despair: And one day, being alone with her, because he would needs be the last man, he began to chide her, and to complain of her rigor towards him: for truly Madam (said he unto her, after many other things) I must needs wonder how you can be so inhumane as to forbid me loving you, since you admit of so many Rivals as your beauty hath made me. If amongst this great number, you had made choice of one which was really worthy of your choice, and had banished all the rest, doubtless I should have much grieved that it was not my fate to be chosen; but yet I should have made a retreat among the multitude: and if I had complained, it should have been in secret, and it should have been more at my want of merit, then at you. But Madam, the case is otherwise, you have made choice of none, but admit of a thousand, and amongst this thousand, you make choice of me, to treat me the worst of them all: yet I do not see they are more submissive nor respectful then my self. I beseech you Madam, do one of these two things; either forbid them to love you as you have done me, or let me love you as they do: yet this proposition was not accepted, though just: for Aglatonice maugre all his complaints, did suffer all to love her but him, but him she did forbid: So that his own heart not being able to hold all his sorrows, he made choice of me for the confidant of his passion. At first, I would not pity him, but upbraided him for neglecting my advice: but at last, he moved me to so much compassion, as I became a sharer in his sorrows.

Page 102 Is not my story sad (said he unto me) and wonderful, that She should treat me the very worst of my Rivals, and yet I know no remedy? Had I but one Rival or two, I could finde out wayes to be rid of them. But now, unless I will fight above a hundred combats, and assemble so many friends as Aglatonice has Lovers, I cannot see it a possible to be rid of all my Rivals; and though I had rid my self of them all, I believe that it would not have any more ingratiated me? Since its credible it would have vexed her to the heart to lose her croud of Adorers, and it would have troubled her more to have seen me alone with her, then when I was in the company of so many men whom I loved not: But Sir, said I unto him, since you cannot overcome your Rivals, let me advise you to overcome your self: Ah Chersias (said he unto me) I did not follow your counsel; but to tell you truly, I did strive, but it was in vain; and Aglatonice for all her indulgency to others, and cruelty to me, has so great a power in my heart, that I am out of all hopes to leave loving her: After this, Iphicrates passing from one thought unto another: Yet this is some comfort (added he) that Aglatonice makes no choice of any whom She suffers to be about her; for if She should do that unto one which She does unto all, I should think my self a thousand times more miserable then I am; for then I should believe She did really love him with whom She should live in a particular and obliging manner, but since She hearkens unto all, it is evident She loves the Gallantry more then the Gallant, so that I am half satisfied: If She did only love Gallantry in general, replied I, Why does She not admit of yours as well as of the rest? Fie cruel friend, said he, Why would you blast that little consolation which I had in deluding my self? Because (said I to him) I will not flatter up a disease which I desire to cure. No, no, (said he to me) never think of finding wayes to make me leave loving Aglatonice, for I do profess and declare I cannot hate her, nor ever will. Then do love her, said I; But let me tell you, that to love, and not be loved, or without hopes of being so, is a thing which I will never advise you unto. This Madam was the mind of Iphicrates when his misery augmented, which I think I told you was like to drive him into extreme despair. Be pleased to know, that as Aglatonice did almost every day make a new Conquest, so there was a man of Rank, who yet was never in love; but because it was the mode to love Aglatonice, he would be in fashion, and tell her he loved her, and increase the number of such as offered incense unto her: But Madam, be pleased to know also, that this fresh Lover of Aglatonice, whose name was Chrisippus, was the very poorest parted fellow of all her Lovers, his wit had neither height, nor depth, nor conceit, nor quickness, nor pleasingness in it; it might truly be called a trifling wit, which sported it self in such pitiful poor things, and was so far from any Gallantry, that unless to very ill taste, it was intolerable to all accomplished men. However, Chrisippus being as I have described, and Iphicrates also, yet there was a huge difference in their destinies, as there was in their desarts: For Aglatonice as full of excellencies as She was, yet was most extremely unjust, not only in denying her affection unto Iphicrates, but also in accepting of Chrisippus much more favourably then any other. Thus out of an unparalleled fantastical fate, the most rarely accomplished man of all her Lovers was only scorned, and the pitifullest poor parted fellow of them all, was really preferred before all the rest. The injustice of Aglatonice was not at first perceived, for it was such an unlikely thing that Chrisippus should ever be preferred, that none could suspect her of such extreme weakness. But as an ill-treated lover useth to observe his Mistress neerer then any other, so Iphicrates quickly saw that Chrisippus was not only permitted as others were, but preferred before them: For since Aglatonice had as great an inclination to him, as She had an aversion unto Iphicrates, She expressed more Symptoms of her affection to him She really loved, then to him She did only suffer: So that the unfortunate Iphicrates was grieved beyond all expressions.

Then began he to do all he was able not to love her, but as there was some predominant power which forced him to love her, and likewise the like power which forced Aglatonice to hate him, he was constrained to love her whether he would or no. In the mean time, since he saw this new Slave every day more like to reign Soveraignly in the heart of Aglatonice, and that reports of it began already to fly abroad, he resolved to talk with her, and once in his life to tell her his mind plainly, so that he watched an opportunity of privacy, yet it was a long time before he could find it: For Chrisippus, who naturally made a business of every trifle, was perpetually about her; but at last Iphicrates having communicated his design unto me, I promised to rid him from the persecution Page 103 of Chrisippus for tomorrow; and in order to that, I did engage him to be at a hunting meeting, which kept him, until it was very night: So that Iphicrates, who went betimes unto Aglatonice, had all the conveniency of talk with her he could wish.

When he first entred into her Chamber, She was reading, but not daring to read on, She laid the Book upon the Table negligently, but did not shut it, as if She intended to read presently again; and She laid it down in such a manner, as Iphicrates perceived that She was displeased at his interrupting her, so that it confirmed him in his resolution of complaining against her: Yet since he would not begin his discourse with complaints, he saluted her very respectfully: What book soever that is you laud by Madam, (said he unto her) I am sure my company does not please you so much as the reading of it did. Truly Sir, said she, I was not weary with reading it, for it is not with a bad book, as it is with a wearisome friend, since one may when they will lay the Book aside, but not so easily berid of troublesome company. Since I am perswaded that you have more Lovers than friends (replied I and laughed) I think Madam you were never put to the tryal of that trouble: Though I do agree to what you say, replied She, yet this does not conclude but I may be troubled, since there are troublesome Lovers, as well as troublesome friends. I know Madam, replied he, how neerly I am concerned in what you say, but I know withal, that there is a Lover sometimes with you, who should not be thought troublesome, and another also who should, at least is so to all that know him, except your self. Iphicrates had no sooner said so, but Aglatonice blushed for anger and shame, for it was impossible, maugre her aversion to Iphicrates, and inclination to Chrisippus, but she must needs know there was a vast difference between those two men. So that Iphicrates perceiving he had netled her, he grew more bold, though he was resolved not to transgress the limits of civility and respect; so that not giving her so much time as to answer: I beseech you Madam, said he unto her, Pardon the excess of my sincerity and plainness, and as you know it is a virtue which I neither can nor will leave off, so I beseech you let me now tell you my mind fully. So none hath any right to take more liberty than they should give unto another (replied Aglatonice coldly) I suppose you will also let my tongue take the like liberty of telling my mind if the fancy take me. You may well think Madam, replied he, that a man unto whom you deny every thing, cannot think he hath any right to impose any Laws upon you: Therefore Madam, when I have uttered my mind, you may freely tell me what you please, declaring unto you before hand, that the worst you can tell me shall not surprize me.

But not to lose such precious time, the thing I have to tell you is, that as violent as my passion is unto you, I have taught it how to suit it self unto my bad fortune, and to subsist without any hope: Yes Madam, pursued he, I can continue loving you, without any hopes of ever being loved again; and the excess of my affection is able to do that, which no other Lover but my self ever could: You know Madam, there was a time when I desired you to hearken unto me, as you did unto a hundred others, or else not to hearken unto those others more than you did unto me: But now, being grown more reasonable, and knowing it was not just to impose harsh Laws upon her from whom I was to receive them, I am contented Madam you should hearken unto all those whom before I desired you would not hearken; and I am contented also you should not hearken unto me, and to carry my moderation a little higher: I do declare unto you, that all the services which I have done you, and all those I shall do, and all those I have a desire to do; all I say will never as long as I live desire any other recompence, but only this, That you will never hearken unto Chrisippus; I conjure you unto it with all imaginable respect, and all possible affection; for truly Madam, he does not merit your ear: I leave you all the rest of my Rivals; so you will but treat him ill; and I do protest Madam, it concerns your honor as much as it doth my tranquility, to do as I desire: You think then (replied She) that Chrisippus is much in my favour: Doubtless I do, replied he, and much better than he deserves, since he is not ill-treated, of this truth I am not confidently perswaded. You have so little to do in any thing that concerns me, answered She, that I advise you to save your labour of prescribing Laws to me, for I conceive my self to have right to hearken unto whom I please, and to impose silence upon whom I please, without any thing to any one, I am satisfied my self, and I care not a straw whether you be or no. But Madam, said he then unto her, is it possible you should not be sensible of your injustice, in hearkening unto Chrisippus more than unto me? What does it concern you, replied She, whether I hearken unto him, or any else, since I am fully resolved never to hearken unto Page 104 you? And to speak truly, the difference between those you would have me hearken unto, and those you would have me not hearken unto, is only in this, I can hear them without loving them, and I am so good as to save you the labour of telling me a hundred things to no purpose: Alas Madam, cryed he out, all this might well have been said unto one who did not love you, but to me, who adores you with infinite devotion, and who can think of nothing but you, it is impossible you should deceive me; for though you should dissemble your thoughts, yet I could discover the happiness of Chrisippus in all your actions; and to tell you truly Madam without flattery, he has not comparably so much wit as you have; therefore I beseech you for your own honors sake, make not choice of him, for I profess I cannot endure you should endure him: Though I did not love Chrisippus more than any other, replied She, yet I assure you, that you have done him a very good office, in telling me that you hate him, for though it be only to spite you, I will treat him more civilly than ever I did; for the truth is Iphicrates, I do intend to be free, and you shall have nothing to do with the carriage of my self: I have as much right to make choice of my acquaintance, as I have of the colors I am to wear; and it concerns you as little whether I see Chrisippus, or see him not, as it doth whether I wear Carnation or Green. Since Carnation doth better become you Madam, then green (replied he & smiled) the choice of what colors you wear is not so indifferent to me as you imagine: for since I do interest my self in the glory of your beauty as well as of your wit, I should be gladder to see you wear what doth become you, than what not. So Madam it does concern me whether you see Chrisippus, or see him not, since though I had no interest directly of my own, yet since I am extremely concerned in your honor, I should be sorry you should blemish it in suffering such a Lover. I pray Iphicrates, said She unto him, put not my patience to the utmost test, for I am so fully resolved that all your sayings cannot perswade me; and the truth is, if it be your destiny never to be loved, you cannot alter your fate; and if the fate of Chrisippus be not to be hated, he shall not, say you what you can; therefore set your mind at rest concerning that matter, and to do you all the justice I am able, I will ingeniously confess, that I know there are some thoughts of you in my heart, which are not altogether just, but since I am not just in it unto my self as well as you, you have no cause to complain: How Madam, said he unto her, would you not have me complain of your preferring Chrisippus before me? Alas Madam, that is not in my power, and not to lye unto you, my mind is so incensed at it, that I should rejoyce with all my heart if you should love any one of all my Rivals, and not him. Since it will do you no good to speak seriously (replied She with half a smile) I shall confess more then you would have me; for I do assure you, there is not one of all those whom you call my Rivals, which I do not love a thousand times better than I do you, no, not excepting Chrisippus: Had you excepted him, replied he, I should have lamented my misfortune in secret, but since you do not, my complaints shall cry aloud, so loud, that perhaps you will be forced to confess, that you did me wrong in driving me to despair.

As Aglatonice was going to answer, one of her dearest friends entred, who did her the greatest courtesie that could be to break off this conference, and She no sooner saw her, but She went to meet her with extraordinary civility. Iphicrates being then in no humour to talk of things indifferent, retired, and with so many marks of vexation in his face, that the Lady who entred, whose name was Parthenopea, perceived it, and asked Aglatonice the reason of his going out: For heavens sake (answered She) press me not to tell you why I jarred with Iphicrates, for I cannot think upon it without anger: I do not use to screw out the secrets of my friends (replied Parthenopea) But to testify that I am more really yours than any else, and consequently may challenge a more particular priviledge than any other of your friends, I must give you some advice which perchance will displease, and tell you, that there are some reports fly abroad which are disadvantageous to you, yet it is a thing only whispered, and not spoken as an absolute affirmative: But for all that, I would it were not spoke of at all, and I did even this day affirm confidently unto those who told it unto me, that they were mistaken, and that what they told me was absolutely false, yet I must confess I am a little afraid it was too true: Since I have not the art of divination (replied Aglatonice and changed colour) I know not what you mean, nor do well know whether I should desire to know it: But since I am armed against any thing the world can say, I beseech you tell me what it says of me? Since you give me leave (replied Parthenopea) I shall tell you, that such reports go as you ought to disavow, for its said, That out of the great number of Lovers which your beauty hath Page 105 made, you have made choice of two to be the objects of two different passions, That you hate Iphicrates who is the best accomplished man of all your Lovers, and that you love Chrisippus who is the worst. Judg Aglatonice whether I have not reason to say, that you ought to disavow this for truth: Doubtless, replied She, I shall not acknowledg that I love Chrisippus, but I shall easily confess, that I do not love Iphicrates. Since you are so unjust (replied Parthenopea, and looked earnestly upon her) as not to love the best accomplished of all your Lovers, I shall extremely fear that you do Love him that is the least worthy: For truly, whosoever does injustice unto true merit, may as well be favourable unto him that hath more: You speak so home, replied Aglatonice, that though you were the intimate friend of Iphicrates, you could not say more in his behalf: I am no intimate friend unto Iphicrates, (replied Parthenopea) but I am unto you, and under that notion, I conjure you to open your heart unto me, that I may know whether I should justify or accuse you; but since we may chance be interrupted here, if you please we will go and walk in some solitary Garden. So that Aglatonice taking her at her word, they went both in Parthenopea's Coach to walk in a Garden which is by the Sea side: But though Aglatonice was naturally of a merry humour, yet now She was verie reserved, and walked the length of that long walk in the Garden without speaking one word, and when she came to the end of it, they sat down upon seats of grass; after which, Parthenopea speaking first. Had we come hither only to look upon the Sea (said She unto her) and to hear the pleasant murmure it makes against the Rocks, you are rightly fitted; for you look and hear so attentively that I believe you think upon nothing else: I assure you (replied Aglatonice) I think, it better to hearken unto the noise of the Sea, then unto you. I think not so (replied Parthenopea) for I had much rather you would hear me than the Sea; therefore I pray tell me truly what are your thoughts, both of Iphicrates and of Chrisippus. And to begin with the first of these, tell me your reason if you can, why you hate him, or at least why you do not love him? Truly, answered Aglatonice, I cannot tell my self, for I am forced to confess, that he hath a thousand good qualities, and no bad ones; but for all that, as there is something in it which makes me that I cannot love him, so also there is something, though I know not what, which makes me hate him: Though I should consent to what you say (answered Parthenopea) yet I cannot consent that there is any reason for your something, and I know not what you mention unto which you ascribe such power to regulate your hatred, or your love: For my part, if reason told me that Iphicrates had a thousand good qualities, and Chrisippus a thousand bad ones, I should sooner believe it, that all your somthings and your I know not whats, which are of such subtil natures, that done knows where to find them, or how to define them. You speak so pleasantly of these, I know not whats, replied Aglatonice, that it is to be believed none was ever troubled with them for you, since you know not the power of them.

To shew you that I am not ignorant (replied Parthenopea) I acknowledg that there is an I know not what kind of ayr in your person, and I know not what kinde of excellencie in your Spirits which doth please and charm me; but for all that, I know very well that you are in the wrong, and if I were in the place of Iphicrates, I am sure, that this I know not what you speak of, would make me leave loving you. But since he can not hate me, replied she, Can he think much that I cannot force my affection to him? There is as much reason for the one, as for the other, and as one may love by reason, so one may hate by prudence. For my part (replied Parthenopea) I am perswaded one may and ought, but when reason is not strong enough to rule all the thoughts of your heart, yet however it ought to be powerful enough to regulate all your actions: And so, since all the world condemns your rigour unto Iphicrates, doubtless you ought to force, and change your way of behaviour towards him. Then, replied She, I must change my heart and my minde, or else change Iphicrates, otherwise I assure you I shall behave my self towards him as heretofore I have done. As for Iphicrates, replied Parthenopea, what would you have changed in him? Which of his qualities would you have him leave? I assure you, replied Aglatonice, I should be much puzzled to tell you; for when I do well examine Iphicrates, and find him handsome, that he is a man of courage and wit, that he speaks elegantly, that he is sincere and generous: I find also, that every one of these qualities in particular doth please me; but I do finde also, that being put all together, they do not please me; and that though Iphicrates be an excellently accomplished man, yet is not so as he ought to be to make me love him. But (replied Parthenopea) Page 106 as you have ingeniously told me what you think of Iphicrates, so tell me I beseech you what you think of Chrisippus? But by all means tell me sincerely. Since perhaps you would think more then is true, if I should make a mystery of it (replied Aglatonice) I will confess unto you, That as I do not well know what it is which causeth my aversion unto Iphicrates, so I know much less the cause of my inclination not to hate Chrisippus. And to shew you that I am not blinde (added She and blusht) I know verie well, that when I examine all that is good in Chrisippus, I cannot finde one single excellent quality, but find that there is many things in him which I wish were not: But for all that, when I look upon him without examination, I must confess that he doth not displease me so much as many others, who are much more esteemed in the world then he is: I do prosess Aglatonice (replied Parthenopea) this is intolerable; for if you were not altogether prejudicateled, and if you did not know the good that is in Iphicrates, and the ill that is in Chrisippus, I should then pitie you in lieu of accusing you: But to see that you should slight that, which by your own confession you know to be worthie of esteem, and to see you love that which you know is not amiable, this is a thing so strange, that I do hate you should be capable of it. Yet endure it you must, replied She, for I do protest I can do no otherwise. Then you do the greatest piece of injustice that ever was done (replied She) Since I do what please I to my self, replied Aglatonice, I will never trouble my self any further. But then, answered Parthenopea, I must not any more deny that which I did so earnestly deny before, and you must dictate unto me how you would have me answer those who accuse you for hating of Iphicrates, and loving Chrisippus; As for Chrisippus, replied Aglatonice sharply, I will not acknowledge that I love him, for you know I do not use to avow any such things; all I would have you do for me is, to keep me from being blamed for my aversion unto Iphicrates. To avoid that blame, replied Parthenopea, you must treat Chrisippus less favourable than you do, and must not hearken any more unto that croud of Lovers which press about you, for then the world will say you have changed your humour, and hath banished all Gallants in general, because you affect not Gallantrie. But that you should suffer a hundred to love you, and out of this hundred you should chuse the least deserving man, and do endure Iphicrates the most meritorious, this is the most unreasonable thing that ever any did. However it be, answered Aglatonice, I shall not follow your counsel, for I do love the world, and hate solitude; and since those who throng about me do onlie make a noise, it is a diversion to me, and to tell you trulie, I delight not in silence unless in a Forest; and yet I had rather hear the croaking of Crows, as harsh as the noise is, than hear nothing at all, and therefore I will continue seeing those I use to do, and I assure you I will not absolutely thwart my self; and I am fully perswaded, that ever since there were any men, there hath been continually some who have loved more out of fancy than reason, and therefore though I did love Chrisippus more than I do, yet I were not so blameable as you make me. Also since I will never do any thing for Chrisippus against what I owe unto my self, surely it were unjust I should go and trouble the tranquillitie of my life onlie for the satisfaction of Iphicrates; and therefore my dear Parthenopea, let not this piece of injustice wherewith you upbraid me, make me lose your esteem or friendship. As for my friendship, replied She, I shall leave it with you; but as for my esteem, I must confess you have a less share in it, then you had when I came to you: for trulie when I consider, that you should slight the most deserving of your Lovers, and prefer the verie worst, I shall think you capable of being unjust in matters of friendship, as well as in matters of Gallantrie, and to prefer the worst woman in all the Court before me, since there can be no greater a difference between her & me, then between Iphicrates & Chrisippus. That which doth most comfort me in your anger is, replied Aglatonice & smiled, though out of spite, because I perceive you do not think I love Chrisippus very well, for if you did think so, you would not speak so scornfully of me. On the contrary, replied Parthenopea, I speak as I do, because I think you do love him, for if I did not think so, I should not speak at all. But I must needs confess, that seeing you so amiable as you are, I cannot endure you should love below your self, and scorn a Lover who indeed is worthy of you; and therefore, that I may no more upbraid you with these two things, I beseech you strive with your self either to leave scorning Iphicrates, or to leave loving Chrisippus. Trulie Parthenopea, said She and blushed, I should be verie much puzzled should I offer it, to make choice of one of the two, for they seem unto me both equally difficult, and since I cannot endure any difficulties, I beseech you pardon, if I do not attempt either.

This Madam was the conference between Aglatonice and Parthenopea, which yet did not Page 107 end thus. For he pleased to know that the Garden wherein they were having three doors, Iphicrates to entertain his own melancholy thoughts did enter in at one, where Parthenopea's Coach was not; and not suspecting Aglatonice to be there, he began to muse upon the oddness of his fate, and so went on in his studie, until he came to the place where Aglatonice and Parthenopea did sit. But to render this accident more extraordinary, Chrisippus returning from hunting sooner than I wished, I made the motion when we came to the Gate <> this Garden, to light from our horses, and take a turn in it: For said I, hunting habits are not fit for the visit of Ladies. So that Chrisippus not dreaming of my design (which was to keep him from interrupting my friend) and being unwilling to displease a man who had diverted him all that day, he lighted from his horse, and went first into the Garden. We had not gone thirty paces, but we saw Aglatonice, Parthenopea, & Iphicrates all together, and yet they saw not us. I seeing this, though I could not do my friend a greater pleasure, then to stave off his Rival all the rest of the day: So as I perswaded Chrisippus, that since these Ladies saw us not, our best way was to retreat, since it was not handsom to shew our selves in such rude habits. But Chrisippus being in love, and of a hasty Spirit to execute what ere he had a fancy to, in lieu of answering me, he went straight to Aglatonice, caring no more for me, then if I had been none of his company. But Madam, in his address to her, he used such trivial expressions, which had neither seriousness, or Gallantrie, or delight in them, that Parthenopea looking slyly upon Aglatonice, She made her blush: But on the contrary, Iphicrates spoke so exactly, and played so handsomely upon his Rival, that Aglatonice in her aversion to him was no less vexed, that Iphicrates did speak well, then She was ashamed Chrisippus spoke ill: So that not to be forced to commend Iphicrates in secret, nor blame Chrisippus, She talked on continually.

Parthenopea having a subtil wit, and perceiving that Aglatonice talked only to make others silent, did whisper her in the ear and chide her: All will not do (said She unto her) for though you hinder Chrisippus from talking of trifles, and Iphicrates from speaking excellently, yet you cannot hinder, but that there will be still a vast difference between them; for indeed you need onlie to observe, how they hearken to you, and how they understand you, to make the distinction. I profess Parthenopea (said She as loud as She could) you are this day one of my cruel persecutors: Have I not good reason? (replied Parthenopea) For my part (said Iphicrates to contradict Aglatonice, though he knew not of whom they spoke) I am perswaded, that Parthenopea is in the right: For my part (said Chrisippus to contradict Iphicrates) I think Aglatonice is in the right. I assure you, (replied Parthenopea and smiled) you do her the greatest wrong in the world to think so, and there were never any thoughts more unjust then hers. Then I am verie happie in taking your part, replied Iphicrates, for since I cannot be of Aglatonices. I must be on reasons side. Though Parthenopea's side be the most just that can be, replied Aglatonice, yet you are very unjust, because you take her part, and know not why. After this, Chrisippus would have said something, as if he would have given the most convincing reasons in the world to prove, that he was more just then Iphicrates, but all his arguments were as light as ayr, and Parthenopea could not forbear laughing; And Aglatonice not being able to stay any longer said, That She feared it would rain, and so retired. But to the grief of Iphicrates, this inhumane person, notwithstanding the great difference which She saw between him and Chrisippus, She turned verie obliging towards the last of these, and giving him her hand: Since you took my part; said she unto him, it is but just I carry you to the garden door, and let Parthenopea do that office if she please for her Champion Iphicrates. I assure you, replied Parthenopea, and laughed, since Iphicrates was with you before Chrisippus came in, he shall not lose the pleasure he would have had, if Chrisippus had not come; therefore he shall lead you as well as Chrisippus, and for me. I hope Chersias will do me the favour to conduct me; and indeed Madam so it was, Iphicrates and Chrisippus both of them did lead Aglatonice, and I presented my hand unto Parthenopea, who as long as we were in the walk which led us to the Gate where her Coach was, She did very handsomly twit Chrisippus with his follies, and applaud Iphicrates, but at last we parted.

Parthenopea carried Aglatonice to her house, Chrisippus went home, and I went with Iphicrates, who as soon as we were in his Chamber, related unto me all his discourse with Aglatonice. Well, said I unto him, after I had heard him out, What do you now resolve upon? To be, replied he, the most miserable man alive. For my part, said I unto him, Methinks you should take a more generous course, and it is much better to cease Page 108 loving Aglatonice, then thus eternally to serve her. I do confess it, said he, but I must do as I can. It is so natural, replied I, not to love those who love not us, and to hate those who hate us, that I wonder you should still love Aglatonice, who you know can never love you: Oh cruel friend (said he then unto me) be contented to tell me that She does not love me, and do not say she never will. Since I know no better way to extinguish Love then to extinguish hope, replied I, I should be sorry to give you any false grounds for it, but would gladly cure you at once of a disease, which none <> administer any remedie unto, but only your self: All you say, replied he, is full of reason? But for all that, there is such a strong inclination in my heart towards Aglatonice, that I am perswaded I should love her, though in the arms of my Rival, and must love her, though she drive me to the Abyss of despair: Indeed I do not love that Aglatonice should have such an unmeasurable love unto all that can be called pleasures and diversions, nor do I affect she should have such a croud always about her, and less, that she should receive incense for all that offer it; I am also vexed to the soul, that she should never refuse any heart but mine, especially that she should treat Chrisippus with a thousand favours above others, but for all this I love her; and if I be not much mistaken, shall love her as long as I live. But I am so baffled in my adventure this day, that I am resolved to try all remedies which are used to advise such as are in love: And since I have heard say, that absence is a most excellent one, I will get me further off Aglatonice, and will depart without bidding her adieu.

Iphicrates had no sooner said so, but to encourage him in his design, I used all my arguments to perswade him to leave Priene for a time, and accordingly, within three daies after, he did depart, and departed without taking his leave of Aglatonice. Yet I am sure that he repented a hundred times of his resolution; but for all that, he did put it into execution in spite of his love, and went to pass away his exile in Samos, to the end that being in a Court of high Gallantrie, he might the better cure himself of his passion. Moreover, during his absence, I did write unto him all that I thought expedient to chase Love out of his heart, for Aglatonice entertained no fresh Lover, but I sent him word of it, nor she conferred no new favour upon Chrisippus, but he had it in a Letter from me: She spoke also many bitter invectives against him, which I did let him know; and indeed I omitted nothing which might conduce to his cure. For all this Madam, my remedies were in vain, and absence, as powerful as it is, could not change the heart of Iphicrates. So that finding himself as deep in love as ever, and since absence did but make him more miserable at Samos then he was at Priene, he writ me a Letter, which I will relate, because it is not long.

IPHICRATES unto CHERSIAS.

TRuth is, my dear Chersias, I know to my shame, that I am the basest man alive, since I do plainly see, I am not able to leave loving Aglatonice; and since so, I must content my self with the misery of loving her without hopes of being loved, and not be so miserable, as to love her and be absent too; therefore within this three daies I shall imbarque, and come to seek some comfort in doing some ill office unto Chrisippus, and in acquainting you with the miseries of your friend.

IPHICRATES.

I must confess Madam, that as well as I loved Iphicrates, I received his Letter without any joy, and heard of his return with much sorrow; for I having contracted an intimacy with Parthenopea, and she being extremely vexed at the injustice of Aglatonice, I understood by her that Chrisippus was daily more and more happy, not that there was any thing in him to stave off other Lovers from his Mistress, but it was because he was incomparably better in her fancy and opinion then any other, though she had no reason in the earth for it. So that when Iphicrates returned unto Priene, he found things in a worse condition then when he left it: And certainly he found it so, for when he went upon his first visit unto Aglatonice, she received him with a strange coldness, and returned such faint answers to all he said, and turned matters so to other subjects, that Iphicrates could Page 109 not understand her. But he having an excellent wit, he presently perceived the malice of this unjust woman, and having no minde to be baffled into silence before so many Rivals, as soon as he saw his opportunity he began to speak and talked as fast upon things which passed at Samos whilst he was in the Court of Policrite, as Aglatonice talked of passages in Priene, during his absence; but the difference was, he told all his stories in a pleasant merry manner, for being desirous to let her see he understood her design, he talked for an hour together the most pleasantly that is imaginable, but all was of things so far out of the knowledge of Aglatonice, that she had no greater share in his discourse, then he had in hers before; and the better to facilitate his design, there was one at that time with Aglatonice, who had been in Samos: And since there happen'd a most strange accident concerning a Ring which Policrite let fall into the Sea, at a Feast with Ladies upon the water, and which was found again a few daies after, he addressed his discourse continually unto this man, and intermixing in his discourse the names of Alcidaia, Menecides, and Acasta, who were Ladies of that Court, he talked of stately Edifices, and composed things and his talk into such an ingenious miscellany, that Aglatonice could not catch an opportunity of handsomly interrupting him, as he had interrupted her. But at last, she being put beyond her patience, and not being able to endure that Iphicrates should return malice for malice, she cut him off short: I have often heard say (said she unto him) that the first visits of a man returned from travel are very dangerous, but I never tried it till now: For (added she in a twitting rally) here is Iphicrates, who hath been no further then Samos, yet he is as greedy to tell all he has seen, as if he had been in Persia, Aegypt, Babylon, Ecbatan, and Scithea, and he talks, as if he had seen such strange things as never were talked of before. Being perswaded Madam that you know most exactly all. Rules of Civility, replied he half smiling, and never use to fail in the least circumstance, I did believe, that since you thought good to talk a whole hour of things which I understood not, so you will not take it ill, if I talked of things which you did not understand; and the rather, because those who return from travel have a peculiar priviledg for being heard: For my part, replied Chrisippus, I know not why they should have that priviledg, for I do not care for knowing things which happen not in the place where I live: Doubtless Sir (replied Iphicrates) it is an argument of great moderation of minde, to confine ones curiosity to the place where he dwells, and it is the only way to get good information: Though it seem you are not of opinion with Chrisippus, answered Aglatonice, yet I must tell you, that I fear nothing in the world more, then to meet with these makers of journeys, and tellers of strange prodigies, who will make it a whole daies work in telling you, that in such a place is a River which empties it self into a Gulf, and rises again a hundred furlongs off; and in another place he found Mountains higher then the Clouds; that in Aegypt the High-Priests Surplusses are with Fringe and Tassels upon it, that the King of Medes Throne is all of gold, that in Phrygia the Gordian knot is the strangest thing that ever was seen, and a hundred such: But I pray, said she in the prettiest rapture of wit that ever was seen, What have I to do with this River, that Mountain, the High-Priest, the Throne of Gold, and that Knot which none can untie? Is it not better to tell of things within the compass of our knowledge, and of such things as concerns us, then of such things of which we have no need? Yet there are a sort of men who are extremely ignorant in any thing that concerns them, and knowing enough in things which concerns them not: For my particular, pursued she, I know a man who can number up all the Monsters about the river Nilus; and knows, as he says, how the Phoenix is produced, and the Halcions, who for all that does not know half the creatures of his own Country. Though the mind of Iphicrates was nettled at the discourse of Aglatonice, yet he could not chuse but think it pleasant: Yet I being present at the conference, and was desirous to turn all into rally, I began to speak, and told Aglatonice, that if ever I travelled, I would be sure of never seeing her, until I was weary of relating unto others all that I had seen abroad: Truly, said she, you would do me a pleasure in it: Yet truly, said I unto her; what you say is not so full of reason as you think it; for I am perswaded, that to confine ones knowledge only unto the things of ones own Country, is the way to limit our knowledge into too narrow a compass, and there is much pleasure to be taken in being acquainted with things that are excellent in all other Countreys: I confess it, replied she, and I believe that those who travel have very much satisfaction; but yet I would not have them at their return, tire those they meet withal with continual relations of it, but tarry Page 110 till fit opportunities to talk of what they have seen, does naturally offer themselves, and and not to catch at all opportunities of talking thereupon. For my part, said Chrisippus, I wonder how any one can finde any satisfaction in being in a strange Country where they do not understand the language, to be put to the inconvenience of changing their lodgings every night, and often put to many a hard shift: Since you did never travel Sir (replied Iphicrates coldly) doubtless you are ignorant of the pains and the pleasures of those who have; yet you may think your self happy that can sit at ease with Aglatonice, and hear what others have learned with so much weariness and fears: For my part (said Aglatonice, purposely to hinder Chrisippus from speaking impertinently) I am not at all sorry to know how they live in other Courts: But to tell you truly, it is an argument of great defect in judgment, to be alwayes relating what one hath seen: Since I am just Madam, replied Iphicrates, I do concur with you: for it is very true, one ought to chuse then persons unto whom he speaks of such things, and never to be long and tedious in his relations, unless he be engaged by the particular curiosity of those unto whom he speaks, for in such a case one may describe a whole Country without any absurdity: But my meaning is Madam, that the most pleasing study one can follow, is travels; and the faire <...> diversion in the world is, to be acquainted (especially from a man of ingenuity) with what is rare, and worthy of observation in all places he hath been, provided it be told without affectation, and without insisting upon such things, as are neither diverting nor necessary; for I must confess, when men will trouble themselves and the company with telling a thousand impertinent circumstances, which relate nothing to the purpose, but are tedious, it were to be wished, that such had never stirred from home; for such, if they had known less, they had spoken less.

Moreover, there are another sort of men, who use to observe nothing but what they should forget, and never minde such things as are most worthy of consideration. But however, though I desire to know nothing but what is worthy to be known, yet I had rather one should tell me some frivolous things, provided there be any diversion in them, then that they should tell me nothing at all; and besides all this, it is oftentimes more agreeable to company, to talk of what is far off us, then what is neer; for there is such strange news abroad here at this time, that it is better to talk of any thing else: Since I do as much desire to know the passages of Priene, replied Chrisippus, as I do hate to know what happens any where else, I would you would tell me what this strange news is? Another time I shall Sir, answered Iphicrates, but now I will not tell it unto any but Aglatonice, if She please to hear it.

Chrisippus hearing Iphicrates say so, was very importunate with Aglatonice to know it, in hopes to know it himself afterwards: But She having as much wit as he had little, did know very well, that She was concerned in what he would tell her, so as she told Chrisippus, that She was not so full of curiosity as he was, and therefore would not desire of Iphicrates any thing he would not tell unto others. But the more she denied Chrisippus, the more he importun'd her, and was so earnest with Iphicrates to impart this strange news, that She to stop the foolish importunities of Chrisippus, did suffer Iphicrates to tell it her in a low voice, and the best jest was, whilst he talked with her, his Rival was the gladdest man in the world, imagining that whatsoever was told unto Aglatonice, he should know it before night, but he was mistaken, for the business was of another nature then to be imparted unto Chrisippus: And indeed Madam, as soon as this Lover had obtained leave to speak low, he whispered Aglatonice in the ear: The strange news I heard as I came hither was (said he unto her) that you do still continue unjust; and that Chrisippus, though an Ass, is more in your favour then ever he was, but that I on the other side am far worse.

Iphicrates had no sooner said this, but Aglatonice with a strange inhumanity, and incredible boldness began to speak, and told Iphicrates aloud, that all this he told her was no news at all, and that She knew all he said long since, and that nothing in the world was more true then it: I leave you to judg Madam, whether or no this cruel answer did incense Iphicrates, yet it did not much move him, but he contented himself with telling Aglatonice, that he was very sorry She knew it, and should have been very glad if she had not; after which, not being able to stay any longer there, he went out, and I with him; and so we left Chrisippus importuning Aglatonice to tell him what Iphicrates had said. But Sir, this unfortunate Lover had a mind so unquiet, that I never in all my life saw such signs of fury in the face of a man; and as soon as he came into his Chamber, he talked to me, Page 111 as if he would run out of his wits: But, said I unto him, Why do you not make use of all these passages to hate Aglatonice? I do protest, said he unto me, My heart begins to resent that which it never did before, for till now, I thought that I should love Aglatonice even in the very Arms of my Rival; but now I begin to think, that if She should marry him, I should hate her: If you be very certain of what you say, replied I, I would do your Rival service in lieu of hindering him; for since you cannot be loved, it is better to hate, then love her who cannot love you, and to cure your self by hatred, then to be eternally miserable, in suffering for one that will neither care nor comfort you. Though I make no question (replied he) but that remedy would cure me, yet I do protest I will not seek it, but on the contrary, will hinder my self from using it as much as I can, not but that my minde desires a cure, but yet my heart resists it; and the truth is, I am the most miserable Lover that ever was. After this Madam, I used a hundred sharp invectives against Aglatonice; and I perceived so well, that if Chrisippus married her, he would not love her, as I resolved to use my utmost endeavours in hastening the happiness of Chrisippus.

Thus to serve my friend; I served his Rival, and did as much for his Enemy, as I could have done for him. But in conclusion Madam, not to be over-tedious, let me tell you, that to satisfie his passion by his revenge, he fought with Chrisippus, and disarmed him: But vanquished as he was, Aglatonice still preferred him before Iphicrates, whom She hated much more then before the Combat: So that I resolved to negotiate the business with one that was Cozen unto Aglatonice, whom I was well acquainted with, and was so happy in my transaction, that the Marriage between Chrisippus and her was made up; yet I understood since from Parthenopea, that though Aglatonice loved Chrisippus, yet yet She could hardly resolve to marry him: But at last Madam, she did marry him without any seeming repugnancy. In the mean time, it was no sooner reported that Chrisippus was to marry Aglatonice, but it was again reported, that he had already married her, for the marriage was not above four daies in compleating: So that Iphicrates, who was gone a daies journey out of Priene, knew nothing of all this: But Madam, he received the news of it in so strange a manner, as I think you never heard the like; and I being accidentally at his Gate when he returned, as soon as he lighted from his horse, and both of us come into his Chamber, he told me how he passed by the lodging of Chrisippus, and there was such a crowd of people, that he believed there had been some quarrel, asking me if I knew between whom: I know not (said I unto him) whether Chrisippus have been quarrelling or no, but I know very well that he married Aglatonice yesterday, and that there are a great crowd of people at his house: How (cried out Iphicrates) Aglatonice married to Chrisippus, Yes, replied I, and I must summon you to be as good as your word; and ask you if you will hate her? Yes, yes, (replied he very sharply) I will, I will hate her, and hate her so heartily, that if I do not hate her, I will hate my self: For truly Chersias (said he unto me) I must not by any means continue loving a foolish woman; that hath wholly bestowed her self upon the poorest parted fellow that lives amongst men: Had She only treated me ill, said he, I protest I should still have loved her as long as I lived; or had She only preferred Chrisippus before me without marriage, I should have suffered her injustice without hatred: But to cast away her self, to satisfie the passion of such a man as Chrisippus, this is a sin so simple, that I can never pardon it: Yes, yes, Chersias, said he, hold me for the basest of men if ever I be either an Adorer or Lover of her that is Wife unto Chrisippus.

At these words Iphicrates stopped, as if he would ask himself whether all this was true, then said he upon a sudden; No, no, I shall quickly leave loving Aglatonice, for I find in my self a great disposition to scorn her: You may well imagine Madam, that I confirmed him in this minde as much as I could, and indeed he was so fully resolved to drive Aglatonice out of his heart, that in a few daies he found his anger to be higher then his Love: And as a great help to his cure, he never came in any place where Aglatonice was not much condemned; so that curing himself by a resentment of spite, he passed from anger to hatred, and a while after, from hatred to indifference, and at last not to endure the very sight of her. In the mean time, this unjust person was justly punished for her injustice, for the shallow capacity of Chrisippus reaching no higher then a terrestrial and gross love, and being of as light a spirit as ever was known, as soon as Aglatonice was his Wife, he was no more her Lover. So that since she could not see this without sorrow, and that a person who was used to receive offers of incense, now to receive slights and Page 112 scorn, she was not only angry and grieved at this, but she was ashamed also of being the Wife unto such a Husband; yet standing upon her honour, she would not express her resentments, but carried it very fair to the world, as before. All her Lovers, except Iphicrates, continued their visits to her, and though now under the notion of friends, yet still were her Lovers.

But Chrisippus, though a man of a very narrow soul, and not capable of any deep discernment, yet he began to be jealous: The truth is, it was no jealousy of Love, which amidst of all its fantasmies, preserves some respect unto the person of whom he is jealous, and may be truly called the jealousy of a Lover; but it was a jealousy of honour, which commonly causes all those who are capable of it to be extravagant with a noyse: So that the unjust Aglatonice did see her self exposed unto all manner of miseries: I also understood from Parthenopea, that She began to be so sensible of her injustice in preferring Chrisippus before Iphicrates, that according as She did drive the first of these out of her heart, she received in the second, and repented her self for treating him as she had done; yet She being indeed virtuous, all this passed in her minde without being perceived, yet She was not altogether so miserable as another might have been in her case, for being a Lover of pleasures, for all the fantastical humours of Chrisippus, She did divert her self. But now every one of her Lovers began to fall off, and to do what they could to displease her, and at last, did hate her, as much as before they loved her: So that Madam, Iphicrates had the satisfaction to see his Rivals revenged upon his Mistress, and his Mistress revenged upon his Rivals; and he had this advantage, to gust his revenge with tranquility, and to finde his heart so freely disengaged from that passion which did before tyrannize over it, that he could not possibly be freer then now he was. But Madam, to come unto that which will prove, that it is not an easie matter to love the same person twice, be pleased to know, that Chrisippus did engage himself in a quarrel, did fight, and was killed, so that Aglatonice was rid of an odd husband, and in a capacity to do justice unto Iphicrates, if Iphicrates was in the same mind as before; And indeed Madam, after she had left off mourning, she changed her lodging, and chance did so fall out, that her lodging was directly over against that of her ancient Lover. So that civility obliging him to see her, he did visit her, and the rather, because he found his heart so absolutely disingaged, that it was all indifferency, and had neither hatred nor affection to her: In this tranquil minde, Iphicrates did venture to see Aglatonice again, and saw her, without the least disturbance of his tranquillity, yet Aglatonice was as far as ever, and he knew very well, that if he would he could succeed in the place of Chrisippus, yet he did not finde the least motion of Love, but was so far from it, as I have heard him say, he would rather marry an ugly old witch, then begin again to love Aglatonice, and his soul was so settled in insensibility, that he would often talk to her of old passages between them, and rally at them. In the mean time, I must confess unto you, that I was nothing pleased at these visits; but was afraid lest he should re-engage himself, for he being a man of strong and violent passions, I wished for his own rests sake, that he should never fall in Love again with her. So that one evening, pressing him to go no more unto Aglatonice, I pray Chersias (said he) never trouble your self, nor fear that I shall ever re-engage my self; but yet▪ She is so fair, (said I unto him) and so sweet as ever she was before, that I must needs fear it: 'Tis true, said he, But Chersias know, that my love of her being once extinguished, all her art can never kindle it again: Since I hate her now, I shall never love her again, it is a thing absolutely impossible, for hatred is a passion as violent as love, Love may change it self into hatred when Love precedes, but when Love passes into hatred, from hatred to scorn and from scorn to dead neutrality, be assured, one can never love again: And indeed Madam the event shewed, that Iphicrates was not mistaken, for he could never love Aglatonice again, though he saw her a thousand times after the death of Chrisippus; but on the contrary, I have seen him become a Confident nnto one of her Lovers; and I have seen him marry another, though he was certain that he might have married Aglatonice if he would. After this Madam, I assure my self you will think this example sufficient to prove, that one cannot love one and the same person twice, and is as strong an example, as that which Menesiphiles related to prove, that one may be twice inspired with love of the same person.

When I had ended my relation, the Princess of Corinth, and the Princess of Lindes, both confessed, that these two examples were extremely contrary: But reasons being allwayes more prevalent then examples (said Eumetis to the company) it were good to examine Page 113 and know whether those of Chersias have more solidity in them, then those Menesiphiles.

But Madam, as I was going to answer, all the Sages were seen to come in, accompanied with Niloxenus, Diocles, and Cleodemes, who after they had argued upon high and excellent questions, came out of the Hall where the Princesses left them, and came to take the ayr where they were: However, since the Princesses had a desire to hear the reasons of Menesiphiles and my self, Eumetis addressed her self unto Periander, and told him, that he came very opportunely to be judg of a question of Gallantry, unto which all the company were to give their opinions: For Sir (added She) though it be no question concerning Government of Kingdoms, or ruling of Commonwealths, yet I think it not unworthy the curiosity of the Sages, since it is concerning all the odd effects of so powerful and general a passion.

Periander then being acquainted with the question, Solon whom it concerned did think it so nice, that he said he was ready to give his opinion, and turning towards the rest, one out of inclination, another out of complacency, and all disposed themselves to give their Votes: So that Melissa being come, and every one taking their places except Aesope, who left his, Cleobuline commanded me to give my reasons, permitting Menesiphiles to interrupt me when he pleased: So that after I had a little thought upon what to say, I addressed my self unto Menesiphiles, as against whom I was to dispute: Methinks (said I unto him) to judg rightly upon the question in hand, and to know truly whether it be not a thing extremely rare (if not impossible) to love one Lady twice, it must be considered what causes love, to the end it may be seen whether it be found in a person whom one loved before: Since it is the same person, replied Menesiphiles, it must of necessity follow, that the same is to be found in her the second time, which was in her the first; to wit, the same beauty the same Spirit, and the same agreeableness; and therefore since these did invite the first time, they may also the second. Not at all, replied I, for though all these be the same, yet they may want one particular charm which highly sets them off, and that is novelty; for that lustre which at the first did dazle the eyes, and beget admiration, by being well acquainted with them, they become but ordinary, use and custome does glut the senses, and it is with beauty as with perfumes, which after the first time, lose their smells, and consequently cannot beget a second liking, or make a new Conquest. Moreover, as there is a necessity of hopes growing up with love: So I hold it a most difficult thing for hope to revive when one leaves off loving out of reason, or despair, or when Love of it self doth extinguish, and I am perswaded that when one leaves off desiring a thing, because he doth think it not worthy to be desired, it is not an easie matter to renew that desire again: However, it is impossible that hope should grow without desires, and that love can subsist without hope. I do very well grant, there may be some quarrelling, during which one may imagine that he does not love, though still he do, but I cannot conceive that when one doth really cease to love, one should ever begin again to love the same person. Yet it is most commonly seen, replied Menesiphiles, that a Candle extinguished will be more easily lighted again, then if it had never been lighted; and though there be no heat at all left in, yet there doth remain a kinde of disposition, which makes it more capable of taking fire; and I am verily perswaded, that when one hath vehemently loved a person, there does still reside some light touch of heat in the heart of that Lover, which makes him more disposed to be moved at the charms of her he loved before, then at the charms of any other; for it must be granted, that she has such charms as will please him, because they pleased him before, and therefore is more fit and likely to engage him the second time, then any other person. For my part, replied I, I must confess I cannot understand how a person, whose charms had not power enough to keep a man from ceasing to love her, should have power to make the same Lover love her the second time: For I am perswaded, that as it is easier to keep the fire from extinguishing, then it is to light it; so it is more easie to preserve Love, then to recreate it: So that in my opinion, as soon as a Lady sees that her beauty cannot hold her Lover, she never need to think of ever fettering him again, if once he really broke her chains: But commonly those who are said to begin to love the same person again, did never really leave loving her, though they thought they did, and questionless some sparks of the old fire lay hid in the Embers, and seeming dead, did deceive their own thoughts: Indeed there are some jealous Lovers, who are so sold in their raptures, as to say they do not love, though all the world knows there can be no real jealousy without love: There are others also, who because Page 114 they have some sparks or effects of hatred in their minde, presently they think they do hate: For sometimes one shall see them in an angry mood, make cruel imprecations against those they adored, yet it often happens, that they would not curse them, but because they love them. But besides these two sorts of Lovers, who love and know it not, and who think they begin to love upon a new score, when as they do only continue the old; there is a third kinde, who think, as the rest, that they are not in love, because their Love cools, and slacks a little for a time, and they are not sensible of it, either in point of joyes, or point of sorrows; but for all that, their affections are but asleep, not dead: And when this kinde of Love begins to quicken by any accident, it must be said only to waken, not revive. So that I do not wonder, many are perswaded one may love the same person twice, since the very same persons, who have these kinds of passion whereof I speak, are deceived themselves first, and then they deceive others, and yet it holds most constantly true, that (without a prodigy) one cannot love one beauty twice, yes I must confess, that when love ceases by reason of any strange or unjust cause, one may cease and begin again to love: For example, if a man in love thinks he is betrayed, and in the heat of his resentment he passes from love to hatred, and a while after he finds that he was mistaken, I believe it will be an easie matter to revive that passion in his heart which he banished, because he finds her to be the same She was when he loved her, this is rather a continuance, then a recommencement of love; but for any other manner, for which a man may break off with his Mistress, I hold it impossible he should ever love her twice. Since it hath happened so in Philidas, replied Menesiphiles, it may again happen so in another. And since it did not happen so in Iphicrates (replied I) it is not likely it should happen so again, for every thing did invite him as much as possible to begin again to love Aglatonice. The interest of his fortune did suit with that of his love, if he could have loved; she was fairer then ever, she was nothing so cruel, Iphicrates was engaged no where else, he saw her every day, he talked with her every hour, his soul was naturally amorous, and he had loved as violently as ever any did, and yet for all this, he could not love her the second time, and doubtless the rule holds true in love as in all things else, that when they are once destroyed and gone, they never return to be the same they were again. But Chersias, replied Menesiphiles, I have many reasons more strong against you; for I believe that the most essential cause of love, is that invisible band that ties hearts so fast together, and is called Sympathy; and I do believe also, that this Sympathy can never end: Since we see all natural inclinations never change, either amongst Inanimates, animals, or men; for the Loadstone will love to draw iron to it as long as it is a Loadstone, the Lion will fear that Bird which is called the Herald of the day, as long as he is a Lion; men do keep for the first inclinations which nature gave them, even unto death; and indeed a covetous man will never be liberal, without a strange violence upon himself, the envious man never commends any without regret, and an ambitious man will never submit without sorrow; and in my opinion, all these several inclinations are not more strong in our hearts, then that Sympathy is, which makes us love one person more then another: So that as all these inclinations do subsist, as long as we subsist our selves, it follows of absolute necessity, that the Sympathy which makes us love, doth subsist also: 'Tis true, our inclinations are sometimes forced by reason, though we still have them; and the effects of this Sympathy whereof I speak, may be suspended by some accident; but for all that, it cannot cease being, and consequently I conclude, that there is still a great disposition to love what formerly one loved, since the cause never ceased: And as there are some certain things which hinder the effects of the Loadstone, so there may be which hinder the effects of Sympathy, but removing those obstacles, the Sympathy begins again to operate, and I am so verily perswaded of what I say, that I do much more wonder to see one leave loving what he loved before, then to see one love one and the same person twice.

Custome and habitude which is so strong in all things, makes also the minde to have a natural propensity of loving again that person whom it loved long: The boughs of trees tatched to a wall, are so accustomed to that posture they are put unto, that of themselves they ply unto it, though untatched, so powerful is habit and custome in every thing. So that it is no wonder at all, if there be a great facility of loving the second time that person whom one loved before, since they do no more then what before they had done: And indeed the example of Philidas, and Anaxandride, makes it apparent, that the reasons I have given are good, for had there not been a powerful Sympathy between them, they Page 115 had never renewed their Love: Philidas had too much wronged Anaxandride ever to think of becoming her Lover again, had he not been forced unto it, and Anaxandride had too unjustly forsaken him; ever to trust his affection; yet they loved more zealously the second time, then they did the first; and whether Sympathy or habitude, or both together, were the cause they still do love with as much zeal as fidelity, and in all likely-hoods will continue so eternally.

After this, Menesiphiles being silent, the Princess of Lindes who was the cause of this dispute, desired all this illustrious company they would be pleased to give their opinions in the matter; and there being men too much knowing to give their opinions without their reasons, these wise men did make the most pleasing definition of Love that ever was. But in conclusion, the plurality of Votes was on the side of Menesiphiles, for they did not only conclude, that one might love one and the same person twice, but also, that it was much much more easie for a man to return unto his first Mistress, then to love a new one; yet they acknowledged that it does not happen so often as it ought, adding, that most of those who cease to love, did doubtless never love very much: For my part (said Aesope, who was of a contrary opinion to theirs) I am sure that I loved Rhodope as well, or better then ever any did or could love, and I am as sure that now I do not love her, nor ever shall, I fortifie the side of Monesiphiles by my example, nor do I like that men should be less rational then the Turtles, who never love but once. After this, passing from one subject to another; the Question was asked, Why beauty did not necessarily produce Love in the souls of all those who beheld it alike? Why some women who were not at all fair, yet raised great and violent passions, instancing also many examples of its odd effects. Solon said, that as hope nourished love, so jealousy did augment it, provided it was not over violent, and it grounded. Periander on the contrary maintained, that this passion was an Enemy to love, though it was inseparable companion. Bias taking a third side said, That a Lover might be capable of jealousy, yet never jealous. Pittacus affirmed, that one was never jealous, but when the party loved did give some cause of it, and if that cause was given he ought to hate her: Cleobulus and Thales on the contrary said, that love without jealousy was but faint and cold: And Chilon according to his natural severity said, That one should not be jealous of any thing but his own glory: As for Anacharsis he said, that one ought to be jealous of every thing he loved, affirming, that one cannot love any thing dearly, but they will fear to lose the enjoyment of it, and that one cannot fear the loss of it without some sparks of jealousy. As for Aesope, he using his Beasts and Birds to set forth his Philosophy, he said, that as the Pelican gives life unto those who give her death, so jealousy is a passion that murders the love which gave it being As for the Princesses, they confined themselves to the modesty of their Sex, and submitted to the opinions of the Sages.

As they were thus discoursing, one came and acquainted Periander with the accident that befell Arion, and Periander causing the man to relate it unto all the company, this wonderful adventure was an admirable diversion to them: For he described how the Dolphin saved Arion so admirably well, and how he brought him to the Port of Tenarus, that it was as pleasing as if they had seen it. But this accident being known to all the world, I shall not trouble you Madam with the relation of it, only tell you, how Periander remembering he had heard Thales say, that men ought only to tell probabilities, but never any thing which is not, though it be true; therefore he asked him pardon, for causing a relation to be made which seemed almost impossible: 'Tis very true, said the wise Bias, that was one of Thales his Maxims; and I have heard him also say, that one should never believe their Enemies in things which seemed most credible: But to believe their friends in things incredible: And therefore you need not fear that he will accuse you. After this, divers examples were related of the love of Dolphins towards men: Solon related that of Hesiod, whose body a Dolphin carried to Land near the Town of Molicy, and which was a cause that they who murdered that famous Poet, were punished. Pittacus also related an example of the goodness in Dolphins to one whose name was *nalus, Son unto the Founder of Mytilene, whose life the Dolphins saved. Well then (said Aesop and laughed) Since Dolphins do such wonders, Why do you mock at my Gayes and my Crows for speaking? For my part (said Cleobul) I do not mock, for they speak so well. that it is hard for any to speak better: Though you do not Madam, replied he, yet there are men who judge of things according to appearances, and who because they see they are but Beasts, which I introduce, do never Page 116 think that it was a man that made them speak; not that they are much in the wrong (added he) for one cannot know the truth by appearances: Then you have forgot your Fox (replied Anacharsis very pleasantly) for when you made him enter into contest with the Leopard, to know which of them two had the most spots, he desired his Judge not so much to consider the exterior spots which the Leopard had upon his skin, as those he had in his head, assuring him, that if he did well consider his, he would find greater variety then in his who disputed so much which was best spotted: 'Tis true (said Esope) I did contradict my self: But to tell you truly, added he and laughed, I have made so many Beasts to speak, that I fear by teaching them my language, I shall at last learn theirs, and by making them become what I am, I shall my self become what they are: Ah Esope, said Eumetis, what Spirit soever you have inspired into your Beasts and Birds, you have yet much more then you have infused into them.

After this, every one according to their inclinations, parted into several companies in that pleasant Grove: Chilon he went walking with Anacharsis, Periander with Thales, Niloxenus, Bias, Pittacus, Cleobulus and Cleodema: But Solon having a natural inclination unto Gallantry, he stayed with the Ladies, and made the conversation more pleasant then ever any I knew in all my life: Indeed this man so wise, and so highly prudent, did know so well how to comply with the times, and persons unto whom he spoke, that he could speak upon every Subject: The truth is, it argued no baseness of spirit in him, for being with the Princess of Corinth, and the Princess of Lindes, he might well talk of the most sublime matters without any fear of being not understood, and he related all that was said amongst the Sages, since the Princesses came out of the Hall, and did it with so much, and in so few words, that he did epitomize all their excellent discourse, to wit, all that morality or policy could teach. Afterwards Solon told the two Princesses, that they ought to think themselves infinitely happy in being so much above all the rest of their Sex, and yet to have so much moderation as to keep within such limits as modesty required all Ladies should in matters of Sciences, and not to shew any such weakness as women are commonly charged with: For truly, said he and smiled, there are but a very few who are not so weak as to wish themselves loved by more men then they would love. For my part, said Cleobuline, I believe one may without a crime wish to be esteemed by all the world, but I cannot allow any should make more men in love with them, then they would love: Yet I assure you Madam, replied Solon, it is the general mind of most beauties, and a mind more dangerous then they imagine: Yet there are many, replied Eumetis, who do only out of vanity, and do not wish to be loved, but because they think that the esteem of Beauty is love: 'Tis true (replied Solon) it is often so; but yet for all that, few Ladies would love, if they were never loved, and when they wish that men should love them, they then begin to love also: For my part, said Esope, I cannot think it necessary to love a Lady before she loves him; and as there are an infinite number of men who love first, so I believe there are an infinite number of women who love first also; and though all the Sages should say the contrary, I should hardly believe them. Ah Esope (said Eumetis) What injustice do you unto our Sex? Believe it Madam (replied he) I am not so unjust as you imagine: For I beseech you, what reason have we to love before we be loved, more then you have? Have Ladies hearts different from the hearts of men? Is not love a passion in their souls as well as in all mens? Is it an act of their will to love, or not to love? The reason why it is not so often said that women love not, and are not beloved more then men, is because only decency has established so a Law, that it is less shame for a man then a woman to love, and not be beloved: But the truth is, all the difference betwixt us is, when women love and are not loved, they say not a word of it, nor make any complaints, and men do tell it, and complain aloud; for since they have eyes, and wit, and hearts capable of being moved, it must be concluded, that they can love before they be loved, as well as men, and to prove it, there need only be considered, that love alone, be it as zealous as it will, does not oblige them to love, but the lover must also please them, for if he do not, all his love will not be worth a straw.

As Esope said so, and Solon was ready to answer, all the several companies which were parted, did accidentally meet in a place which six walks joyned, so that the company rejoyned again. And Solon finding the question which Esope put to be worthy of curiosity, did propound it unto the illustrious company, who prepared themselves to give their opinions. For my part, said the Princess of Lindes, I think it so strange to love before I be loved, that I cannot endure to hear our Sex accused of any such weakness. But Madam, Page 117 said Esope, it must be one of the two that must begin to love, and if so, why not the woman as well as the man-lover: Because (replied Eumetis) decency will not permit it: But Madam, said Esope, since the Law of Nature is more ancient then the Law of Decency, that argument is but weak. It is certain, said Solon, that to speak truly, a woman may love before she be loved as well as a man, yet it is as certain, that it is not so, so often, and the best reason that can be given for it is, because women are fairer, and all the ornaments both of body and mind more attractive, and more engaging then mens, and consequently their merits does produce a more quick effect then ours, so that commonly men do love them before they have leisure to be loved again. Moreover, women are born with more vanity, and so have less disposition to be first in love; and as they are brought up, they are not permitted to follow the pure course of nature, because from the very Cradle they are so told and taught not to love before they are loved, that they keep a continual Guard upon themselves; yet for all that, I am perswaded it is not impossible, but it may be so sometimes: I assure my self, replied Esope, that Chilon with his austerity would think himself dishonored, if he should read such a Lecture upon Love as Solon hath done: Truly, replied he, I find him to be very knowing in matters of Gallantry, to be a maker of such excellent Laws, at least I know there is none in Lacedaemonia, who knows so much as he: Since the Athenians, replied Solon, are nothing so wise as the Lacedaemonians, I can confess without shame, that I do understand what love is, as well as the rest of the passions.

But to return to the question in hand, what is the opinion of the company? For my part (said Thales) I think a woman may love the first, but I think withal, that few women can love long unless they be loved, and not pass from love to hatred: For my particular, replied Periander, I think it may be so, but I think also, that a Lady is not very amiable, if in loving she does not soon make her self loved: I am so fully perswaded, said Cleobulus and smiled, that Ladies are more fit to be loved then to love, that I am so far from thinking they should love first, that I can hardly think they will love when they are loved: I am not of that opinion (said Bias) for I do think that when they are loved, they will love more earnestly and firmly then men; but I must confess, I can hardly think they can love first, because there is not one of a thousand women who does not love those testimonies which love useth to produce, better then the Lover who gives them; and since these testimonies cannot be met with, if she love first, I am perswaded they are not capable of it. For my part, said Pittacus, I think that love not being an act of the will, it grows in the heart of a woman before she be loved, as well as in the heart of a man: For my part, said Anacharsis, I know not what the power of love is in Greece, but in Scythia neither men nor women do love before they be loved, or at least before they find a disposition, and hopes of being loved ere long, for I do not think it possible love should subsist without those conditions, not but that there may be some exceptions, but to speak in general, it is as I say: Though Egypt, replied Niloxenus, be far different from Scythia in all things, yet they think as you say. Well, said Solon, it must be granted, that it is not impossible but Ladies may love before they be loved: Truly, said the Princess of Lindes, it is not impossible, but yet it is very difficult: Yes Madam, said Solon, to such as have such souls as you have: But that would be too great a favour unto your Sex, and to set you too much above us, if we should attribute such thoughts as yours unto all women.

As Eumetis was going to answer the civility of Solon, a sweet Consort of Musique was heard in the midst of the Grove, which imposed silence unto all the company, unto which after they had hearkened a while, they parted again into several companies; but as the Sun was ready to set, and Thales using to observe the heavens, he stayed to look upon that glorious Planet, which having spread its golden rays upon the Sea, did seem to communicate a part of its light unto it. As for Solon, he staying to hear the Musique with the Ladies, by chance he sped at the root of a tree close by, a long file of Aetes, which with wonderful earnestness, order, and affection, did work for their publique utility: So as admiring the order which they kept in their works, he contemplated upon them very seriously; but Esope who was next him, knew well enough what he thought, and what it was which invited his serious looks: Confess the truth Sir (said he unto him and smiled) would you not be glad the Athenians would observe your Laws, so well as these observe theirs? I must needs confess it (replied Solon and laughed, as well as all that heard him) and I confess it to the shame of my Country: Since your Country hath a Page 118 man who gives them such just Laws (replied Cleobuline) it must needs be very glorious: It would be much more, if they would observe them, replied he, then in giving birth unto a man, who perhaps keeps them not himself.

After this, Solon entering into discourse of the Government of people, he was full of rare expressions, and all the company assembling the third time, the discourse grew all serious, each of them reporting the most commendable customs of his City. Thales spoke of the Milesian Piety: Pittacus of the Martial inclination of the Militenian Inhabitants. Bias of their politness which dwelt in Priene: Cleobuline of the Lindean honesty: Periander of the ambitious people in Corinth: Solon of the stirring and seditious humour of the Athenians, and Chilon of the austere and virtuous inclination of the Lacedaemonians. After which, examining the virtues and vices of all these several and different people, they discoursed so long upon it, that it was full time to return to Corinth: And indeed the discourse of these great wits did so much win upon the Spirits of all who heard them, that Esope had not observed abundance of birds, which came to take up their lodgings in the woods, and had not shewed by them unto all the company what time of the night it was, it had been too late for them to have returned: And he came to all the Sages, telling them very pleasantly, that these birds were wiser then they, and better knew the time of the night then they did. In conclusion Madam, all the company concurring with Esope, that it would be night before they reached Corinth, if they tarried any longer; and so all departed fully satisfied with the daies discourse: Yet Madam, do not judge of it by my imperfect relation, for I must confess my unworthiness to be a relator of all the passages at this Banquet of the Sages.

Chersias having ended, he received a thousand thanks from Cyrus, and as many civilities from Onesile; the like did Menesiphiles. After which, saying she would make use of that advice which Esope gave unto the Sages. She did rise up to depart, lest it should be dark before she came to that little Town where she lodged. But Cyrus desiring her to take part of a collation before she went, she stayed; and during all that time, nothing was talked on, but on what Menesiphiles and Chersias had related; and I cannot tell whether the discourse of Cyrus and Onesile during the collation, was not as admirable as that of the Sages during theirs: Telagenes also had a thousand quirks of a pleasant wit. After which, Onesile taking Coach, she departed with a Convoy, and left Cyrus in a strange impatience, to hear something of the happy success of Anacharsis. In the mean time, though he would willingly have taken some hours to talk with himself, yet he spent it all in keeping up that Noble heat in the hearts of his Commanders and Souldiers, which had gotten him so many glorious Victories. So that talking sometimes to one, and sometimes to another, he inspired them all with that heroic heat which was in his own heart: Mazares also did much help him in disposing the Souldiers to fight gallantly when time should call them to it, though the small interest he had in all these Victories did procure him many a sad hour, and truly his virtue stood in need of all its strength to resist his love. Myrsiles for his particular was not less zealous then Mazares, though he had no surety of Dorallisa's affection; yet he had this satisfaction to know, that though he was not loved, yet no other was, and that Andramites was hated. In the mean time, after he had with much impatience long looked for the return of Anacharsis, that famous Scithean returned without obtaining any thing from Thomiris, and without Ortaques his being able to get a sight of Mandana, because she was then more strictly guarded than at the beginning; yet since he saw Gelonide, the Princess received his Letter, and returned an answer, but the answer was in such a moving strain, as it did more grieve than comfort him. Araminta also answered in a way so fit to incite sadness, that Cyrus was much more miserable after the return of Anacharsis, then he was before. But I pray (said this grieved Prince unto that Noble Scitheat, after he said he could obtain nothing) What can Thomiris say to colour the War which she brings upon her self, by detaining the Princess Mandana? She says Sir (replied he) as much as any can say that will not tell the true reason why she acts with so much injustice. Indeed she hath published a Manifest to the people, and in the Courts of both the Scitheans, by which she declares that you aspire unto Universal Monarchy, and that the Princess Mandana is but the pretence to colour your ambition: That when this fails you, then you will find another, and that's her reason she will not restore her unto you, since it is some security to her self to have her in her power. After this, she convenes all the people, and all the Princes who are ignorant of your authority, to unite themselves courageously, and to give a stop to your Victories.

Page 119 Thus Sir, your great Conquests giving some colour to her reasons, this Manifest is doubtless very well taken by the people, who seeing She is resolved to make War with you, do begin to think out of their dull capacities that now it is not in her passion which incites her unto her undertakings; so that the Massagetans seem as if resolved to defend her to the very last man. The rest of the Scitheat Kings do combine against you, and not one of them but makes Levies, and joins with Thomiris against you. But Sir, the worst I have to tell you is, Ariantes having been in your Army, and being most knowing in all passages, he conceives, that when you have passed over the river Araxes, you cannot get to the Tents Royal, but by such a way as where one file can but pass at once: So that to give a stop to your passage, he hath built a Fort which is now almost finished, purposely to defend that pass, knowing that if your Army do take that way of the Plains, it will perish, by reason of the abundance of waters: So that conceiving you must come by that place which he hath fortified, he thinks you not in a condition to do any good; and indeed, Thomiris cares so little for guarding the pass over Araxes, that she charged me to tell you, that she will have no peace but what victory will give her; and to make it appear she has no mind to protract the war, she consents if you please, that you shall enter into her Country, and in order to that, her troops shall retreat three daies journey from Araxes: Yes wise Anacharsis (replied Cyrus) since the Massagettan Queen will have it so, I will enter into her Country; and though the Fort she has erected be more difficult to take than Babilon was, it shall not stop my designs: Sir (replied this Sage Scitheat) though Thomiris seemed to be very high and obstinate in her resolutions, yet I despair not, but to see her change her mind, if the first accidents of this War should succeed ill, and therefore Sir despair not.

After this Sir, Ortaques told Cyrus, that one of Mandana's Guard (who said he had seen Feraulas on the banks of Phases, and had promised to acquaint him with all he knew) had charged him to tell him, that Thomiris would never have offered to let him pass over the river Araxes, but to engage him in a battle upon an advantageous place, that she would never have offered it, but in a belief he would not accept it; and that unless he could take that Fort which Ariantes had built, it would be a hard matter to overcome her, or come near the Tents-Royal. But to take this Fort, said Cyrus, I must pass over the river Araxes, and be perfectly acquainted with the situation. Moreover Sir, replied Ortaques, Gelonide charged me to tell you, that Ariantes did what he could to hinder Thomiris from sending you word by Anacharsis, that she would let you pass over the river Araxes, because he said that it was the worst that could befall him: But this Princess desiring no more but to engage you Sir in her Country, intends (as Gelonide says) That when you are entered into her Country, to break or burn your Bridge of Boats by which you passed over the River, to the end she might be sure to have you in her power if she got the victory, as she hoped she should, by reason of those difficult passages you would be engaged to take; and that's the reason (as she told me) why Thomiris does not advance with her Army, but will suffer you to pass over, and come to seek her: She told me further, That Aripits, who is still in love with that Princess, does bring her great aid: But never was the like reports heard, as of their unequalled pains which built the Fort which Ariantes erected, and which is called the Fort of Sauromates, because it was the Sauromates which made it; for that people being used to work in the Mines in their own Country, they can carry and remove the earth with such ease and haste, that they will do more work in one month, than others can do in four. Moreover Gelonide told me how she had discovered, That not long since Arsamones had sent secretly unto Thomiris, and was negotiating some business of great importance with her. And Sir, she had told me further, if one had not told her that Thomiris sent for her; and doubtless there had been some combat between some persons of note; for the Messenger from Thomiris to her said, That there had been some disorder about a quarrel; but since he did not further explain himself, and since I was to leave him, and depart the same hour with Anacharsis, I could know no further. But since Adonacris does stay a day or two longer, in hopes to work upon Ariantes, you may happily at his return know whether this great disorder will bring any thing advantage you Sir, or no: And Anabaris can also by him send you word what he can gather from his friends, for he hath conferred with them, and will send their answers by him.

After this, Cyrus desiring the advice of all the able men about him, upon a business of such importance, he held a Council of War, at which he entreated Anacharsis to be present, Page 120 but that Sage Scitheat told him that he would be ever ready to execute his orders, but desired excuse from meddling in mysteries of so high a nature. So then Cyrus assembling Croessus, Artamas, Mazares, Myrsiles, Intaphernes, Gadates, Gobrias, Indathereses, and all the rest who used to sit in Council, he propounded the state of things unto them. At the first, the plurality of voices was, that Cyrus should send unto Thomiris, to tell her he was ready to retreat three daies journey from Araxes, so she would her self in person come over in the head of her Army to meet him, so she would bring the Princess Mandana with her, and so she would promise to restore her if she was overcome, and so she would engage her self to give battle within three daies after she had passed over the river. But Cyrus not being accustomed to go back, and not being able to stir a foot further from the place where he was to deliver Mandana, it was evident that this Proposition did not please him; and he was very glad to see that Croessus and Mazares were not of that opinion, but of his. And the truth is (said he to all the Assembly) to go back before a Queen after our vanquishing so many valiant Kings, were to dishonour our Army. Moreover, who knows whether after we have overcome them they will yield unto us the fruits of our Victory, though they should promise it? And whether in coming over the river whereof they are Masters, they will not defend it with the remnant of their broken Army, and hinder us from delivering Mandana? So that to act prudently, and with glory both, I conclude it best to accept of the offer which Thomiris makes of letting us pass over the river Araxes, for pass we must, though she should defend it: But Sir (said Indathereses to him) the advice which was given you does merit very good consideration: For your Army cannot advance towards Thomiris by the Plains, by reason of water; and to pass through the woods where she hath built a Fort, the pass is so narrow, that I dare not answer for the event, if you pass that way with your Army: When we are on the other side of the river, replied Cyrus, then will we find out which pass is best; for indeed it is to no purpose to capitulate with Thomiris, and to tell her that if she be overcome then she shall restore Mandana, but if she be, that will follow of it self, and therefore it need not be demanded: And though I should be beaten, and my Army shattered, I would fetch another and renew the war; and as long as there is a man left in all the Countries I have conquered, or in the Countries of Cixares, or my Fathers, I will still fight for Mandana's Delivery; and therefore over the river Araxes we must pass some way or other. I understand this morning that Boats and all things necessary to make a Bridge are ready, and without staying for any answer from Thomiris, they shall begin the Bridge this very day; in the mean time, I will send Chrisantes to tell Thomiris, that I will ere long come and bring my answer my self in the head of my Army.

Cyrus spoke this with such a resolute voice, that none durst oppose his will: So that every one conforming themselves thereunto, this Prince assured them that his resolution would succeed happily; and indeed he made his words good, for he bestirred himself with so much diligence, and gave out orders with so much judgment, and they were executed with so much quickness, that the Bridge over Araxes seemed to be made by enchantment; for the Boats were brought so suddenly, and tied unto one another in so short a time, that the Troops of Thomiris did not know the Bridge was made before the Van-guard of Cyrus his Army was over. 'Tis true, to deceive them, this Prince caused some Boats to be brought unto a place over against them, and began to work, as if the Bridge was to be made in that place. And whilst they were amusing themselves about this feigned Bridge, Cyrus was making another much below the other, in a place where on the other side there was no houses. So that this Bridge being made without any obstacle, there was two Brigades drawn up into Battalia by break of day on the other side of the river, to facilitate the Pass of the Army, if any opposition come: But Cyrus needed not to fear that, for there was such a terror amongst the men of Thomiris when they knew of certainty that the Army of Cyrus had passed the river, as they knew not what to do; yet the Commanders after they had a little heartened their men, they forced them to march towards the place where this Army passed over: But when they came there, they would not permit them to attempt any thing, for the whole Vanguard of Cyrus being all over, and drawn into Battalia, they were in a good posture of defence: Yet the Massagetans made some skirmishes, but they succeeded so ill, that they were forced to retreat, and send Post haste unto the Tents Royal to acquaint Thomiris with the passage of Cyrus over the river.

In the mean while, this Prince having spent all the night and all the day in passing over Page 121 the rest of his Army, and had given orders for their incampment, he resolved, without giving so much time unto Thomiris as to be acquainted with his passage, to send some Troops towards her, and himself to go in person and view those narrow passes which was so much talked of; for knowing that this Princess intended to guard the passes, and not advance with her Army, he would see whether there was any possibility of surprising the Fort of Sauromates, before she had stopped the avenues in the Wood, and before the Fort was finished. So that taking some guides, he went with Mazares, Indathereses, Atraspes, Aglatidas, Ligdamis, and twelve or fifteen others, to view these passes. So that setting out at midnight, and making towards the Fort of Sauromates, he got to the entrance into the Wood by break of day, without any obstacle, or any fear of any; for conceiving Thomiris to be still at the Tents Royal, where Anacharsis left her, she could not so soon hear of his passage, or guard the narrow passes which he went to view, since she thought him to be on the other side of the river.

Thus trusting to his own prudence and good fortune, he entered into the wood by the conduct of his guides. But he was no sooner got a hundred paces within it, then he heard upon his left hand a noise of horses. Presently after, he espied the Queen of Massagettes on horseback in the head of thirty Cavaliers, coming towards him. This sight so surprized Cyrus, that in lieu of advancing towards her, his first thought was to check his horse from going so fast, yet indeed he could not well tell what his thoughts were at that time. As for Thomiris, as soon as she spied Cyrus, fury did so raise her heart, that she turned fiercely towards those who followed her. Valiant Massagetans (said she, and shewed them Cyrus with her hand) you would this day end the war, and revenge your Queen, if you could bring into my fetters that terrible Enemy which I shew unto you.

Upon these words, those who followed Thomiris, advanced towards Cyrus; and this fair incensed Queen having that day a Sword hanging in a Chain of Gold, whose Buckles were set with Diamonds, she drew it fiercely out of the Scabbard, and by a menacing action made a sign unto Cyrus, that she thought her self now able to be revenged upon him for his scorn. On the other side, this Prince, who out of an heroic shame to draw his Sword against a woman, and a woman who heretofore had loved him, and still did, as angry as she was, he seeing her men coming to assault him, and considering that if he could get Thomiris into his power the war would not be so long, since Ariantes had not so much power over the people, and so consequently Mandana would be sooner delivered, he turned towards those who followed him, and after many encouragements, and charging them not to kill Thomiris, but endeavour to take her, he advanced towards them also, and fell on so sharply, that though they were more in number, stronger, yet the first shoke made them believe they had the worst of the bargain, and Thomiris sent one of her men in all haste unto Ariantes, who was viewing on the other side to come and help as soon as he could. In the mean time, the fight was fierce, and Cyrus made his way through the first rank of his Enemies, and breaking through the rest, but getting near Thomiris, fury and jealousy together obliged her to draw her Sword. Cyrus no sooner saw this, but letting the point of his Sword fall, and suspending his valour: For heavens sake Madam (cried he) force me not to use my Sword against a Queen, whom I would have served were she not unjust. Thomiris no sooner heard these words, but she commanded her men to cease fighting. Cyrus did the like; and both being obeyed, an object both terrible and glorious, both was to be seen in the wood, for eight or ten men might be seen dead upon the spot, and those who were alive had such a fierce grimace in their looks, as expressed abundance of terror. As for Cyrus, though there was fierceness in his eyes, and anger and fury in his soul, and had a Sword all bloody in his hand, yet his action was so full of respect, and it was so apparent, that his desire was to deliver Mandana without ruine unto Thomiris, that there was none but plainly saw it, and the generosity of his heart. As for Thomiris, she was so fair that day, as none but Mandana in the world could come in comparison with her. This Princess was that day mounted upon a goodly black horse, whose trapping was pure gold; the habit of Thomiris was cloth of Gold with borders of green, mixed with Carnation, and it was made after the mode of Pallas when painted armed; her Gown being tacked with buckles of Diamonds, made her Buskins to be seen, which was suitable to the rest of her habits: The dress upon her head was adorned with precious stones, and a Carnation white and green plume did hover over her fair hair, which waving at the pleasure of the wind, did confusedly Page 122 mix with the feathers as she turned her head, and a thousand negligent, but lovely curls, gave a rare lustre unto her beauty. Moreover, her sleeves being turned up, and tacked higher than her elbows, and she holding the Bridle of her Horse in one hand, and her Sword in the other, the fairest arms in the world were to be seen quite bare. Fury also had put such a fresh Carnation upon her cheeks, that she was now far fairer than ordinary. Also her joy to see Cyrus, and to find him in such a respective posture towards her, had so quelled that fury which was a little before in her aspect, as she seemed infinitely amiable and charming. Also her hopes of taking him if Ariantes came soon enough to aid her, did fill her full of delight, and moved her to speak less sharply unto him, purposely to stay him the longer. So that after the combat was ceased, and Cyrus had let fall the point of his Sword, and desired her not to force him to ruin a Queen whom he desired to serve: This fair Souldier, answered him, that since it was he who began the war, she might continue it without injustice: The war Madam (said he unto her) shall quickly end, if you will be pleased to deliver the Princess Mandana: Doubtless (replied she) Mandana will be quickly delivered, if you please; for provided you will become a prisoner in her room, I will engage my self to make Ariantes to deliver her, or else I will do it with out him. When you have sent her back into my Camp (replied Cyrus) I do engage my self to come into yours Madam, provided Mandana consent unto it: For I do protest Madam, I would do any thing in the world to procure her liberty and your favour. To procure my favour (answered she, and lessened her tone) you know that the way is not to be Mandana's Lover: For as long as you are (added she, and raised her voice again) She shall be my Prisoner, and I will be revenged upon her for all the injuries you did me, in departing out of my Dominions without my permission. Oh Madam (cried out Cyrus) if you keep Mandana Prisoner only to be revenged upon me, I beseech you deliver her, and I will promise you to punish my self for the crime whereof you accuse me, and of which I cannot repent. At these words, Ariantes accidentally appeared with his Troop, though he had no orders from Thomiris.

This Princess seeing him before Cyrus did, and not doubting but now Cyrus would be in her Fetters as well as Mandana, she told him, That it was not now a time to talk of Mandana's liberty, but to surrender his Sword, and become her Slave. She had no sooner said these words, but Cyrus and all his company seeing Ariantes and Andramites coming in the head of fifteen or twenty horse, they then gave themselves for lost. In the mean time, Cyrus seeing no delay was expedient, and that he was so far from taking Thomiris, that he was himself in danger to be taken, he took upon the right hand for fear of being compassed about; one passage at this encounter was excellently remarkable, for Cyrus as he parted in an instant from Thomiris, it was in his power to have killed her, & he saw the thing so easy to be done, that it was his virtue only which restrained his arm; he was so absolutely Master of her and himself at this time, that imagining it would be a shame for him to kill a Queen, he used not the least action which might raise suspicion he had any such thought; but on the contrary, as he left her. Learn Madam (said he unto her) by the respect I bear unto you, to respect the Princess Mandana, and do to her what is fit, since I do not to you what I could. On the other side, Thomiris who saw that Cyrus by his respect gave her an opportunity to give him a blow, did upon the first burst of her fury lift up her arm, but a second thought restraining the first, she negligently let fall her Sword, and looked whether Ariantes was coming. In the mean time, this Rival unto Cyrus, seeing that this Prince by reason of his quickness could not be compassed about, he joyned his Troop unto that of Thomiris; so that now he overnumbered his Enemy by more than half. 'Tis true, his repugnancy to fight against a Prince unto whom he was obliged, did something lessen his ordinary valor, and made him fall on more faintly. But Thomiris charging her men not to kill Cyrus, but to take him, and promising great rewards if they did take him, she did so encourage them, that the Conquerour of all Asia was never so neer taking Prisoner since he was at the Castle of Hermes, as now. But his great heart being bravely seconded by Mazares, Indatheres, Aglatidas, Ligdames, Alraspes, Feraulas, and others which followed him, they did so closely unite themselves, and kept a pass in the wood where they could not be compassed about so well, that they stood the first charge of Ariantes so vigorously, as those who would have broken them were broken themselves. So that Cyrus falling violently into the body of his Enemies, he met with Ariantes. As for Thomiris, she only gave orders, and fought not, still charging her men continually not to kill Cyrus, but to take him. In the mean time, when this Page 123 Prince was neer enough Ariantes to be heard: Oh thou perfidious Anaxaris (said he, and fell upon him) restore me that Princess whom I trusted thee withal: I cannot tell whether Anaxaris will restore her unto you (replied that Prince, and warded the blow which Cyrus made at him) but I am sure Ariantes will not, though he knows he does you wrong, and is ungrateful. After this, these two fierce Enemies talking only with their hands, the combat became hot, and if their numbers had been a little more equal then it was, Cyrus had certainly defeated his Rival, as brave as he was. But since he still retained his judgment, he perceived that if he strive only to vanquish Ariantes, himself would be overcome by his men, and fall into the power of Thomiris: So that after he had very dangerously wounded Ariantes in the left shoulder, and seeing there was no way but to retreat, he disengaged himself from amidst his Enemies, and rallying all his men together, he still retreated fighting, and so bravely, that his followers began to faint upon it: For since Ariantes by reason of his wound did not follow, and since Thomiris would not follow any further for fear of an Ambuscado, Cyrus by his wisdom and rare valour made good his retreat; with the loss only of three Cavaliers. In his return he perceived that he had received a flight wound in his right side: So that seeing no more Enemies to fight with, he hasted his march that he might be dressed, and came very happily to his Camp, where he was expected with much impatience, and so he left Thomiris in most insufferable despair.

ARTAMENES, OR The Grand CYRUS. The Nineth Part. BOOK. III.

AS soon as Cyrus was come unto his Tent, he altered the orders which he had given Chrisantes of going to Thomiris, and he took a short accompt of the state of things whilst his Chyrrulgions were sent for, and gave his orders for every thing in so short a time, that he had nothing to do when they came, but to search his wound, which they found to be very slight, and without any danger: But yet they told Cyrus, that it was absolutely necessary for him to keep his bed two daies, and to be seiven or eight before he ventured on horseback, because his wound being neer his hip, it could not close in a short time, unless he gave it rest; adding, that if he did not take that course, it would be in danger of a Gangreen, and make him much worse. At the first, Cyrus would not obey them, thinking seven or eight daies, as so many ages; for he knew that as long as he could not stir, his Army could not attempt any thing. Yet at last, considering that their advice in such things was to be followed, he obeyed them; yet he had scarce rested himself two hours, but Adonacris, who stayed in the Tents Royal after Anacharsis returned, and came to give an accompt of his voyage: Truth is, Cyrus was not hugely hasty to ask him news, considering the tempers he had left Thomiris and Ariantes in: However, he had a desire to know what made him so soon quit the Tents Royal, and what moved Thomiris Page 121 and Ariantes to go into the woods where he met them, for he knew they could not have any intelligence of his passing over Araxes. So that as soon as Adonacris came to him; I do not ask you generous Adonacris (said he unto him) How you have prevailed with Ariantes; for having talked with him when he had a Sword in his hand, I know what answer he made you: But I ask you, what moved Thomiris to come into the wood on this side the Fort of Sauromates? Sir (replied Adonacris) to satisfy your curiosity, I must tell you of many important passages; and therefore though my negotiation proved ineffectual, yet I beseech you give me leave to acquaint you with what I have done, to the end you may better understand what I have to acquaint you withal: I shall tell you then Sir, since your silence seems to give consent, that true it is, I have not prevailed with Ariantes; yet most certain it is, that once I saw his mind stagger, and when I remembered him of all his obligations to you, I found in him as much shame as love. Yes my dear Adonacris (said he then unto me, when I pressed him very earnestly) all that you tell me is most true, and I must confess that Anaxaris is a base ungrateful and perfidious man, such a one as Cyrus has reason to hate, and that he is equally unworthy, both of the friendship of Cyrus, and of Mandana's love. But Adonacris, though Ariantes had a desire to repair the fault of Anaxaris, that it would be in vain if he should attempt it; for Mandana is so little in his dispose, that Thomiris will hardly suffer him to see her, and therefore he is far from any ability of rendring her unto Cyrus: Therefore, since I should repent in vain, because I cannot release her if I would, I had better not repent at all: Also I am perswaded, that I should ere long repent that ever I repented: And therefore, I beseech you do what you can to make my Rival hate me without scorn, and endeavour to lessen the greatness of my crime, by instancing the greatness of my love.

After this Sir, I redoubled my reasons and my prayers, and I dare assure you my affection at that time made me say much more than a more able man than my self could have imagined at that time, and upon this occasion. But as I was with this Prince, one came from Thomiris, to acquaint him, that the Prince Phraartes going to see the works at the Fort of Sauromates, did meet with a stranger and fought with him, and that he was mortally wounded as well as his Enemy: So that Phraartes being high in the esteem of Thomiris, she no sooner heard in what condition he was, but she went from the Tents Royal unto the Fort of Sauromates, where they had carried him, because he fought neer that place: So that setting out about two hours after Anacharsis, and carrying the Prince Ariantes and Andramites with her, I followed them, hoping that my importunity might happily work with Ariantes.

Thus I came with them as far as the Fort of Sauromates, where we were no sooner arrived, but Thomiris and Ariantes went to visit Phraartes, whom they found at the last gasp, yet having his intellects perfect, he desired to speak with them in private, and so he did for half an hour: After which, he growing speechless, they left him; but it was very observable, that as soon as they had talked with Phraartes, they consulted a long time together, the mind of Ariantes seeming to be displeased at something. After this, Thomiris left him, and went to see him whom Phraartes had fought with, whom they brought into the same place. So that it is to be imagined this unknown man was some very considerable person: However, I could not know any more of him; all I can tell you is, they are both dead, and the same honors were done unto them. But Sir, to end my relation, Ariantes and Thomiris having a design to engage you amongst those narrow passes which are in the woods about the Fort of the Sauromates, went to view them, and to see where they should place their men, in case you came over Araxes. But since it would be too much to view them all in one day, if they went together, Thomiris and Ariantes took several ways into the woods to view these passes, not knowing that you had passed the river; and those who watched the river, thinking her to be at the Tents Royal, it's probable they sent their intelligence thither; and I can assure you they knew nothing of it at the Fort of the Sauromates, until the return of Thomiris and Ariantes. In the mean time, though Ariantes was wounded, he would needs send news of it unto the Tents Royal, where the body of the Army lay, but he would not let me speak with him: So that I returned to you Sir, very sorry I was not able to do you any better service, no more then the friends of Anabaris, who have all promised me to let slip no opportunity which Fortune shall present unto them, to endeavour the liberty of Mandana. When Adonacris had pronounced these words, one came and told Cyrus, that the man to Page 126 whom he spake unto neer Araxes, when he returned from seeing Onesile, asked very earnestly to speak with him. So that Cyrus thinking it to be the same man whom he sent to the King of Pontus, to tell him it was better fighting on his side, then for the Ravisher of Mandana, he commanded him to enter. So Adonacris being retired, and this man entered, Cyrus asked him, What he had to say from the King his Master? Sir (answered he and sighed) I beseech you pardon me that I cannot conceal my sorrows for the death of a Prince who was your Rival; but what he hath commanded me to tell you, will perhaps render me excuseable, and oblige you to lament the misfortune of so great a Prince. How (cried out Cyrus) Is the King of Pontus dead? Yes Sir, replied he, and died with thoughts very contrary to the Prince who gave him his death. This is such a wonder to me (replied Cyrus) that you must relate the accident with all its circumstances before you can make me believe it: Which to do Sir (answered the man) I must tell you, that after I left you, I went over the River at the next passage, and I was so happy, that the next morning I met with the King my Master, who stayed at the first house to get a horse. But Sir, though I told him all that you charged me withal, and though he was much moved at it, yet he continued his journey three daies after; and being told, that the way through the wood was the nearest way to go unto the place where the Army was, he took it, and went unto the Fort of the Saumorats, where enquiring of news in general, he understood that Phraartes (whom he knew at Cumes) was in the Tents Royal; and he heard further, that he was to come that very same day unto the place where we were I cannot tell you Sir the thoughts of this much to be lamented Prince upon this occasion: Ah Fortune, Fortune, cried he out, thou art too fully resolved to persecute me, and my constancy must submit, must I be overwhelmed with so many disgraces all at once? I love, heavens knows, and I am not beloved; I have lost two Kingdoms, and my Enemies possess them; I am obliged unto the Rival who is preferred before me; I do infinitely esteem that Princess who prefers him, and him also as much as she doth; I do hate Ariantes, both as my Rival, as the Ravisher of Mandana, and as my Vanquisher; yet for all this; I am resolved to fight for him, rather then for Cyrus, and to compleat all my miseries, I do find the Ravisher of Araminta in this Court: Will honor suffer thee to see a Prince that stole away thy Sister, and not be revenged for that affront? No, no, since thou art not capable of any ill, but what Love forced thee to commit, thou canst never be excused if thou dost. After this Sir, this great Prince was silent, and making signs unto me that he would be alone, I retired. But as chance would have it, next to the Tent where I was, there happened to be two strangers, whose language was not unknown unto me, for I had been so long in Pontus and Bythinia, that I very well understood the language which they spoke, it being the same. I heard these two then speak aloud, because they did not think I did understand them; and one of them told the other, that Arsamones would be extremely glad to get Araminta into his power, and that he doubted not but that the Princesses which he would give as Hostages, would shortly bring it to pass: 'Tis true, replied the other, Arsamones would perhaps be glad, but Spitridates would be sorry if he knew it; and I cannot tell whether it be wisdom or no in us thus blindly to serve Arsamones in all his violences, and when the Prince his Son comes to reign, he will make us repent it. After this Sir, these two men changing place, I could not hear any more what they said: However, I thought it fit to let my Master know what I heard, and therefore went to tell him, and he having a longing desire to know more, and not doubting but those I heard talk were his Subjects, he resolved to shew himself unto them: And indeed without more consulting with himself, he went out of his Tent, and went to the place where these men were, who were so amazed at the sight of him, that though they saw him in a condition far different from what they had formerly seen him, yet now they trembled, and were infinitely respectful to him: He knowing their thoughts by their actions, took advantage of the disorder in their spirits, and spoke with such Majesty, that he obliged them to tell him what they did in that place: So as he understood by them that Arsamones (who heard Phraartes went towards the Massagettes) had sent unto Thomiris, and offered her a very considerable diversion of Cixares by a powerful assaulting him, and by raising a party in Assiria, provided she would put Araminta into her power, engaging himself also to let her marry Phraartes, and offered her for security of this Treaty, to put the Princess his Daughter, and the Princess his Niece into his power, upon condition she would promise also, that if ever Spitridates came into her power, during the Wars she Page 127 had with Cyrus, she would put him unto his. After this, these two men who were of Heraclea, told him, that Thomiris accepted of the offer, and Phraartes accepted and consented unto it also, thinking he was more sure to marry Araminta in the Court of Arsamones, then in the Court of Thomiris: These men also added, That they came into that Country and stayed in it, to keep things in the same condition they are, and that ere long the Princess of Bythinia, and the Princess Istrina would arrive. Then they said that they came to see this Fort out of curiosity only, and they understood that Phraartes would be there also that day. And indeed Sir, these Subjects unto the King of Pontus told him as much as he desired to know, and when they told him that Phraartes was gone to view the works without, the King of Pontus charged these two men not to tell what he was, and charging them with as much authority as if he were upon the Throne: Afterwards he took horse, none knowing his design. But Sir, not to trouble you with too many imperlinencies, he went to the place where they said Phraartes was, yet he did not shew himself at first unto him; but as soon as he spied him, he galloped a little into the wood, and gave me a Letter in which he had written something, which he charged me to give Phraartes who was looking upon the workmen; but not to tell him whom he was: I in obedience to my Master carried the Letter, Phraartes read it, then asked me in a low voice who sent it, and where he was? Sir (said I unto him) he is within two hundred paces of this place, but as for his name he hath charged me not to tell it, and I dare not disobey him. After this, Phraartes being brave, and his valour a little questioned, he stood no longer in asking the name of him who desired to see him with a Sword in his hand, but thought of contenting this unknown man who demanded satisfaction for a wrong; and imagining (as he said afterwards) that perhaps it was Spitridates, he would not any longer defer the giving him his desired satisfaction: So that sending away all his men upon several pretences, and after he had sent me back to tell my Master that he would be with him presently; he followed me within a quarter of an hour after, and came to the place where I appointed, without any other company but one Page only, and without other arms then a Sword: For my Master, as I understood since, did send him word, that a Sword only should decide their difference. But Sir, he wondered much when he came to the place where his Enemy was, and knew him not, but this wonder was quickly vanished by the entrance of another; for as soon as the King of Pontus saw him, he drew his Sword, and advancing towards him: 'Tis now a fit time to tell you (said he unto him) that I am the Princess Araminta's Brother, and am able to hinder you from putting her into the hands of the Usurper of my Kingdoms. If you be the same you say (replied Phraartes and drew his Sword) you need not complain against a Prince who would take Araminta from Spitridates, whom you love not. 'Tis true, I love him not (replied he) but I do esteem him, which is more then you do. To be a Ravisher away of Mandana as you are (replied Phraartes in a surely manner) you are very sensible of a carrying away. At these words, the King of Pontus with out any answer advanced towards him with incredible fury and valour: Phraartes on his side he fought like a man that was sorry to fight against the Brother of his Mistress; yet his valour being a little clownish, as they who knew him said, he fought with the King of Pontus with as much animosity, as if he had been his Rival: For my part, I was forced to be a Spectator of the Combat, for Phraartes having but one Page with him, I could do no otherwise. But Sir, after a long and sharp dispute, and both mortally wounded in several places, the King of Pontus ran Phraartes through the body, so that he fell from his horse, and let his Sword fall, which the King of Pontus lighting in an instant, seized upon. Thus was he the Vanquisher of Phraartes; but he no sooner saw himself victorious, but he fell also within four paces of his Enemy: So that I being forced to make use of the Conquered Page to help the Conquerour, I sent him to acquaint them in the Fort with this accident. So that many people coming in, they carried these two wounded persons into the Fort of the Saurmates, and sent to acquaint Thomiris and Ariantes with the passage. In the mean time, though a Chyrurgion said my Masters wounds were mortal as well as Phraartes, yet I told not who he was, lest they should arrest me, and hasten his death by that violence. But when Thomiris and Ariantes came, I understood that Phraartes told them, and desired them to promise they would hold on the Treaty with Arsamones, to the end that Araminta being once in his power, she might never marry Spitridates. But Sir, as soon as Phraartes had made this unjust desire unto Thomiris and Page 128 Ariantes, he lost his speech, and a little after his life. In the mean time, Thomiris knowing from Phraartes the quality of my Master, she came to see him, followed only by one man of quality, called Andramites: As for Ariantes, it is to be imagined, that he would not visit his Rival: But Sir, this miserable Prince, into whose mind the approaches of death had infused more just thoughts both of you Sir, and Mandana, he used such moving arguments to oblige that Queen to restore the Princess unto you Sir, and to persuade Ariantes unto a repentance of his violence, that should I relate them to you Sir, you would be charmed with his virtue: yet for all this, I plainly see Sir, that Thomiris will not be perswaded; nor stayed she long with him, but though an enemy, yet she promised to have a care of him. I have so small a share in life (said he unto her) that I will not aske you Madam, any thing for my self; no not so much as a Tombe, for I do not desire to eternize the memory of my miseries. But Madam, (said he and sighed) I beg all things of you for Mandana: After this, Thomiris going out, without any direct answer, and this miserable King perceiving he could not live long, commanded me to let the Princess Mandana know, as soon as I could, that he repented of his violence to her, though he could never repent of loving her, and conjured her, not to hate his memory. As for you Sir, he charged me to tell you, that he was extremely sorry he died ungrateful, and that he could not chuse but dye your Rival: and desired you to have a care of the Princess Araminta; also to tell you, that he would dye the friend of Spitridates, and commanded me to tell him as much. After this Sir, his reason beginning to rove, he spent the whole night in talking continually of Mandana, but without any cause or moving thereunto; afterwards growing weak upon a sudden, he dyed about break of day: and thus both Conquered and Conqueror dyed almost of one munit: and after their deaths they received the same honours by order from Thomiris. In the mean time, that Princess being upon the place, she would needs go and view the woods about the Fort, before she returned: and in the mean time, and whilest you Sir, was fighting with Ariantes, a servant unto Andramites, whom he had left there upon some business, came and addressed himself unto me out of curiosity to know who it was I so much grieved for his death: For Sir, I forgot to tell you, that Thomiris did not publish his quality after his death, and I imagine her reason for it was, because the news of the King of Pontus his death should not be carried unto the Princess his Sister, before she returned to the Tents Royal: But Sir, as soon as this servant unto Andramites had accosted me, we knew each other, and remembered that we bore Armes together at the Sieg of Ephesus, when the Prince Artamas, went under the name of Cleander: So that embracing each other with joy, we began to relate our adventures, and to renew our old friendship which formerly was very great: But to tie the knot more fast between us; he imparted unto me his intentions of serving you Sir, and I told him also who was my master, and what he had charged me to tell you, upon his death bed: So that encouraging each other in our intentions of repairing the faults we had committed against you, and of doing you some considerable service, we walked together about the Fort; and observed that at the place which is not yet finished, it is so easily to be surprized, that with five hundred men only, one may become Master of it: So then wishing earnestly that you had passed over the River Araxes, to attempt this enterprize, we thought our wishes had been in vain, because we then knew not that you had already passed it. But Sir, when Thomiris and Ariantes returned wounded we quickly understood that you were neerer then we imagined. So that now this servant of Andramites and I, looking upon this business as a thing very feasible, we carefully examined the matter again: and to facilitate our design, Thomiris and Ariantes departing, Andramites, as good luck was, did leave this servant in the Fort, by orders from Ariantes, with orders to come and acquaint them when it was finished: and he left him there also as a Surveyor over the workmen; for this man the better to further his design, had so insinuated with his Master, that he made him believe he had served the Prince of Cumes, in the Fortifications of his Town, and that he understood the art of it as well as any man: Then Sir, after the departure of Thomiris and Ariantes, this man and I considering the Situation and present condition of the place, we resolved, that I should come and acquaint you, how, if you would be pleased to send five hundred men speedily, by such a way as a guide I have provided will shew you, you may presently become Master of it: But Sir, this must be done presently, for it is reported, that as soon as Thomiris is returned to the Tents Royal, and hath taken all orders for the security of the Princess Mandana, and for the departure of Araminta, Page 129 whom she will send unto Arsamones as soon as the two Hostage Princess are come, she will then return with her whole Army to make good the passes which he hath viewed, and to engage you to fight in a place which will be very disadvantageous to you. Therefore Sir, hast must be made, and no greater number must be employed then I mentioned, lest the Fort should have intelligence. You tell me so many strange things at once (said Cyrus) that I know not which to answer first; yet I must tell you, that I do much lament the pitifull fate of the Pontean King, I do commend your fidelity to him, and I will recompence your zeal to me. After this, Cyrus enquiring of him the true state of the place, he found him talk so pertinently, that he saw there was great probability of doing some good in the design, so it were speedily executed; and he sent for Mazares and Indatheses only to confer with them about it, having no mind to impart it unto a Council of War, lest it should be known. So having broke it unto them, and told them that he thought it worth the hazard of five hundred men, they concurred with him in opinion: So that Cyrus making choice of Feraulas for this bold attempt, he sent for him; and afterwards he called out the Troops which he was to command, and giving him all necessary instructions, it was resolved he should set out in the beginning of the night, and when he was near the Fort to make a sign by fire, which would advertise the servant of Andramites of their being there, and he according to agreement would answer them by another, and let them precisely know the place where they were to surprize the Fort; and in order to all these resolutions, those Troops which Cyrus made choice of to be under the command of Feraulas, departed in the beginning of the night, guided by the man whom the King of Pontus his servant had provided. But after they were gone, Cyrus began with leasure to consider the lamentable death of the Pontean King, and to deplore the misfortune of a Prince whom Fate had strangely persecuted all his life long. Afterwards calling to memory the death of the Assirian King, he was full of compassion for these two illustrious Rivals, as he was of amity to Mazares. So that contracting all the hatred he ever bore unto them against Ariantes, he hated him alone as much as ever he did them all together; yet it was such a hatred as was accompanied with esteem for all the high acts he had done at Sardis, and at Cumes: But the greatest grief of Cyrus was, that he was not to stir yet for some certain daies; but in the mean time he gave orders for every thing, and saw all those who had any thing to say unto him: 'Tis true, the desire he had to hear the success of this enterprize did take up much of his mind, so as it was not entirely at liberty; yet he talked unto all his friends, as if his soul had no extraordinary cares upon it, and to inquire very obligingly of all their interests: He asked Artamas how Palmis did; Aglaïdas of Amestris; and Ligdamis of Cleonice: But as for Intaphernes, he would never acquaint him with the Treaty between Arsamones and Thomiris, because it should not grieve him: And he commanded all the Officers whose Quarters were near Araxes, that if they met with any Cavalry conducting Ladies, that they should use them respectively, and bring them to his Camp: Truth is, Intaphernes was not long in this ignorance; for being one morning at that Bridg of Boats which Cyrlus had made over Araxes, to view some Troops pass which were newly come, and which Ciaxares had sent unto Cyrus, he espied the Prince Atergatis, and as soon as ever he saw him he went to him, and without lighting from his horse, because the place would not permit it, they shook hands, and confirmed their friendship: But having many questions to ask each other, they went further from the Press; and Intaphernes finding much melancholy in the eyes of his friend, his heart began to fear, and he had a great mind to ask how the Princess of Bythinia did, but he durst not; yet being able to hold no longer: Well my dear Atergatis (said he unto him) Are you banished from Arsamones for doing me any good offices unto the Princess his Daughter? Alas, alas, (replied Atergatis and sighed) You would much wonder did you know the cause of my journey, and you would both wonder and grieve if you knew that the Princess of Bythinia, and the Princess Istrina, are either now in the power of Thomiris, or will be very shortly, and that the Princess Araminta will be shortly in the power of Arsamones: How's this (cried out Intaphernes) Can there be any truth in this you tell me? For heavens sake tell me, how comes this sad adventure to pass? After this, Atergatis told him as much as Cyrus knew concerning it; to wit, the Treaty between Thomiris and Arsamones. But (said Intaphernes unto him) How could you suffer such an unjust thing without opposition? Had I known it, I should have thwarted it, replied Atergatis, but Arsamones Page 130 did negotiate the business so secretly, as all was concluded before I knew any thing, and to prevent any obstacle in the departure of the Princesses, he sent me to Heraclea whilst he shipped them for Chrisipalis, to send them unto Thomiris. But as soon as the Princesses knew their design, they were so sad at it, that moving the heart of one in the Ship to pity them, he promised to come and acquaint me as soon as the Ship came to Land; and the next morning the Ship came ashore, because the Princess of Bythinia desired to send and offer a Sacrifice at a Temple which was by the Sea side, and this man came then out of the Ship and never returned, but come immediately to me, and acquainted me in few words with all the passage: So that conceiving I could not possible overtake the Princesses, nor ought to return unto Arsamones, nor stay about that business he had employed me, I came in all hast unto you, and about three daies march hence, I met these Troops with whom I came: But in my way I understood that the Princess are carried by away far off, to the end they might shun the Camp of Cyrus, when they passed over Araxes.

Intaphernes hearing this sad news, was all sorrow: But at last he told Atergatis, that hoping well in the valour of Cyrus, who in delivering Mandana, would deliver these Princesses also, he prepared to carry him into his Tent, after he had sent to advertise him of his intentions: So as Cyrus not being ignorant of his name and quality, nor of his merit and adventures, nor of the friendship which was between Intaphernes and him, he received him with all possible civility: But when Intaphernes would have acquainted him with the Treaty which Arsamones had made, he stopped him, and said he was not ignorant of, but kept it secret, because he desired to save him some sighs; adding, that as soon as ever he heard of it, he gave orders to all his Officers, that if they met with any Ladies to respect them, and bring them to his Camp. After which, these two Lovers being both satisfied with the cares of Cyrus, they thanked him with equal civility: Atergatis for his particular did it with so good a grace, that Cyrus saw he merited that excellent Character which he who related his history had given of him. But to begin their friendship by a confidence, they condoled their misfortunes together, and Cyrus made such a pathetic abridgment of all his miseries unto these two Lovers, that he suspended their sorrows for their own, because they found his case worse then their own. For truly (said he unto them) you have no Rivals who hold your Mistresses Captive, and Thomiris hath no interest to treat them ill: But as for Mandana, she is under the power of a Lover, and under the power of a Queen, who thinks she has reason to hold her from me. In the mean time, Cyrus understanding more precisely the way which these two Princesses would take in coming from Bythinia, he commanded several Parties to scout about the River Araxes, as far as there was any hopes of meeting with them, or at least the Princess Araminta, whom Thomiris was to send unto Arsamones, when the other Princesses came unto her; and he imagined that She would send her with the same Convoy, and by the same way. So that Intaphernes and Atergatis having a great desire to go themselves in person, Cyrus considering their interest, permitted them, telling them most obligingly, that he was very sorry he could not go himself, and help them to deliver their Princess, as he hoped they would help him to deliver Mandana. In the mean time, Anacharsis being charmed with the virtue of Cyrus, did visit him very often, telling every one he spoke unto, that hitherto he had learned to talk of wisdom, but by the actions of Cyrus he would learn to practise it. This Prince also for his part did find such a real sincerity in the conversation of this Sage Scythian, as did infinitely please him; and such a grandure of thought, as did much move his inclination. Also the discourse of Anacharsis did much help to drive away his melancholy and sorrows that he was not able to act, and made him expect with much less impatience the success of his enterprize. But at last, better news came then he durst hope for, and that Guard of Mandana's, who was become Andramites servant, also who had plotted the business, came to beg his pardon, and told Cyrus that his enterprize was effected, and that he was Master of the Fort; and to particularize this great attempt, he told him that Feraulas conducted by the King of Ponts man, did march so fast and happily, that those within the Fort had not the least knowledge of his coming, and that the sign by fire was so well given and taken, and the assault so surprized the Garrison, that they were damped with fear, and cut in pieces.

Moreover, that Feraulas after he was Master of the place, had so encouraged the workmen, and promised such great recompences unto them if they finished the work, that those men having heard of Cyrus and his liberality, did fall on work, and promised to Page 131 finish it within two daies. This great and good news infused as much joy into this Prince, as if he had been in a condition to advance with all his Army. But besides that his wounds would not give him leave, another accident fell out which hindered him from thinking of it; which was, That the river Araxes by reason of great winds which tossed the water, had broken his Bridg, and the current of the river was so impetuous, that most of the Boats were broken, and shattered in pieces one against another. So that since the Army of Cyrus could get no subsistence but from the other side of the River, his whole care was to repair the Bridg, that he might send over victual and ammunition to his Army: All they could do, the Bridg being broken, was to send over every day as much as those Boats which remained could carry, to make them subsist. Thus Cyrus was of necessity forced to wait and attempt nothing till he could get on horseback, and until the Bridg was made again, and also till victual and ammunition necessary for his march was passed over. In the mean time he took incredible pains to repair the bridg, and sent him who brought the news of the Fort being taken, to tell Feraulas, that if he were assaulted to defend himself, in hopes of a speedy relief: But after he had kept his bed four daies, the Chyrurgions permitted him to rise, so he would not go out of his Tent of four or five daies more. So that being one morning with Mazares, Artamas, and Myrsiles, one came to tell him that the Prince Intaphernes, and the Prince Atergatis were coming, and that they brought some Ladies with them. This news did extremely surprize Cyrus, yet upon better thoughts he imagined, that perhaps they had met with their Princesses, and got them out of the hands of those who would have carried them unto Thomiris: So that hearing those two Princes desired leave to bring those two Ladies unto him, he was well contented. But this Prince was much surprized when Intaphernes and Atergatis brought in the Princess Araminta and Hesionide, in lieu of the Princess of Bythinia and Istrina, whom he expected. 'Tis true, he saw her so sad, that thinking she knew of the King her Brothers death, he durst not express any joyes, nor begin to treat her as Queen; and beginning to think that Mandana had lost a great comfort in losing the company of this Princess, he could not retain his first joyes of seeing her, but he let her see by his eyes, that he would perform all he had promised: Yet this Princess having as much judgment as spirit, did think Cyrus would be much troubled to tell her of the King her Brothers death, she resolved to speak unto him first; and indeed she was no sooner come into his Tent, at the entrance into which he received her, but beginning to speak first: Give me leave to tell you Sir (said she unto him) in justification of that sorrow which sirs upon my cheeks, that though I have reason to rejoyce of my liberty, and at the honor of seeing you, yet my Brothers death is the cause of my sorrow; and to justify his memory, I must acquaint you, how I understand from Thomiris, that he repented of all his violencies unto the Princess Mandana, and though he have perhaps merited no pity from you, yet he has merited your permission to let me lament him: I have done it my self Madam (replied Cyrus) and have extremely pittied the sad destiny of so great a Prince; and I thank the Gods with all my heart, that though he hath been my Rival and my Enemy, yet that you Madam cannot charge me with his death: And I assure you Madam, that if I could revive him, though with the same Love unto the Princess Mandana, yet I should joyfully do it to cease your sorrows, and stop your tears. But Madam (said he, being forced by the violence of his love) Why did you not bring the Princess Mandana with you? That I might have been obliged unto the Prince Intaphernes, and the Prince Atergatis for delivering her, as I am for setting you at liberty: Alas Sir (replied she) I need not answer this question; but after I have commended your generosity in lamenting the death of your Enemy, I must tell you, that the Princess Mandana is now guarded with so much exactness, that there is no delivering her but by the overthrow of Thomiris, yet she is waited upon with much respect, and she knows so well how to make her Ravishers fear her, that the Prince Ariantes trembles as oft as he comes near her, and speaks unto her as humbly as if she were not in his power. But Sir (pursued she) the news of taking the Fort of Sauromates hath extremely amazed the Queen of Massagettes, and if the Prince Ariantes had not been wounded, it had been ere now besieged; but that Prince being unable to act; by reason of his wounds, I believe the design is deferred for some certain daies: After this Sir, I must needs (maugre my sorrow) tell you of the Prince Intaphernes, and the Prince Atergatis their generosity, who knowing that those who conducted me were carrying me unto Arsamones (a mortal Enemy unto the King my Brother) did fight them, and brought me unto you Sir: When Page 132 you know them well, replied Cyrus, you will finde that you are more obliged unto them, then you imagine; for as you are a Debtor unto them for your liberty, so are you unto the Prince Atergatis, for the liberty of Spitridates: When one hath done no more then what was their duty to be done (replied that Prince) there is no obligations owing: and by the same reason (added Intaphernes) I do declare, that since I have done no more then what I ought to have done, I cannot pretend unto any right of obligation: However it be (said Cyrus) you will give us leave to think what we please. But Madam (added he) I can stay no longer before I tell you, that we expect the Prince Spitridates his being here very shortly: Do you know Sir, replied Araminta, and both blush'd and sigh'd) where that unfortunate Prince is? I do not directly know in what place he is Madam (replied Cyrus) I know he will arrive here ere long, and that he was at a Port in Chalcides, when the Prince Tigranes did write unto the Princess Onesile, and so I know he will ere long have the happiness of seeing you. After this Sir, Cyrus asked Intaphernes and Atergatis, in what place they met this Princess: And after they answered, that they found her as she was passing over the river, he asked Araminta whether the two Princesses which Arsamones gave as Hostages unto Thomiris, were come or no? To which she answered, as she had before Intaphernes and Atergatis, that they arrived the day before she came away, and that she was extremely sorry she could not obtain so much leave as to see the Princess of Bythinia, whom she had long loved. After this, Cyrus told her, that though the unfortunate King her Brother had only left her the Title of a Queen, yet he would treat her as Queen in possession of those two Kingdoms which he had lost: For Madam (said he unto her) I know that the Prince Spitridates will restore them to you, and I am sure he will never enjoy the usurpation of Arsamones; but as soon as he comes here, will treat you as Queen of Pontus, though his Father possess the Kingdom. And Madam, if it be the pleasure of fortune that I shall deliver Mandana, Arsamones shall render Justice unto such as it is due unto. Araminta charmed with the civility of Cyrus, did answer him with as much generosity and spirit, and with as much sorrow as generosity.

After which, Cyrus ordered that she should be waited upon unto a stately Tent, and to stay there until Boats were ready to convey her unto the Town where Onesile was, where she might be more conveniently and safe. At the first, though Araminta did infinitely esteem that Princess, yet when it was proposed to be with her, she could hardly consent unto it, because she was Sister in Law unto Phraartes; but Cyrus satisfying her that this Princess did highly condemn the violence of Phraartes, and that Tigranes was a dear friend unto Spitridates, and a great Enemy unto his Brother for carrying her away, she was well contented to be with her: Also she seeing but two ways to chuse, either to stay in an Army, or to stay with a most virtuous Princess, she quickly resolved with her self, and was conducted by Chrisantes unto her the day following: Cyrus first sending to acquaint Onesile with the King of Pontus his death, and with the death of Phraartes, also with the arrival of Araminta, to the end she might know how she ought to receive her.

The meeting of these two Princesses was very tender, and they spoke so excellently unto each other, as it was most evident they had both of them as much judgment as spirit, and as much virtue as judgment. In the mean time, the Bridge being repaired, and Cyrus being ready to go out of his Tent, he resolved to pass over with all possible speed all such provisions as were requisite during his march, and to disencamp as soon as they were over, giving several orders for a continual supply of subsistence for his Army. So that being to depart within two daies, he resolved to employ one of them upon a Visit unto the Queen of Pontus, and to bid adieu unto the Princess of Armenia. Since Cyrus loved the company of Anacharsis very well, he obliged him unto this visit with him. So that Cyrus setting out betimes in the morning, accompanied with that renowned Scythian, Indathorses, Araspes, Ligdamis, Aglatidas, Menesiphiles, and Chersias, it was early when he arrived. Since Araminta was in mourning, and moreover since he would treat her as a Queen, he went first unto her, and afterwards unto the Princess Onesile. But he took no notice at his entrance, that Anacharsis did not follow him, but stayed at the bottom of the stairs with a stranger: 'Tis true, as soon as he was in Araminta's Chamber, he missed him, and asked for him: But Chersias telling him that he stayed with a man who seemed to have much business with him, he went on with his visit, and did indulge himself so deep in talk of Mandana with Araminta, that he forgot Anacharsis; for Page 133 since she had so lately seen his Princess, he could talk of nothing else; and it was so great a pleasure to him to talk with one who had so lately seen and spoke with her, that he never thought of his going unto Onesile: yet at last he left her, and went unto the Princess of Armenia, and in passing from one Chamber to another, he saw a man of a handsome presence who seemed to be a Grecian, walking in the outer Chamber with Anacharsis, and who no sooner saw Menesiphiles, but he came unto him; yet Cyrus being near Onesiles Chamber, he entred without staying, his mind being so full of Mandana, that he would not interrupt his own thoughts by asking Anacharsis why he did not follow him: But when he was in the midst of Onesiles outer Chamber, Anacharsis overtook him, and beseeched him to let a friend of Solons, of Menesiphiles, and his (whose name was Silamis) have the honour to kiss his hand: So that Cyrus staying, and the Grecian being near him, he saluted him very civilly, and told him, That since it was impossible to be a friend unto so many rare men, unless himself were excellently accomplished, he was very desirous to be acquainted with him. After which, asking him what was the cause of his voyage, Silamis answered, That having several reasons to be absent from Athens, he resolved for Asia, and to come unto Artaxates to see Onesile, unto whom he had the honour to be allied: And Solon having obliged him to see Anacharsis, who he knew came unto Asia with Menesiphiles, Diocles, and Chersias, and to tell him from Solon, that he had good reason to say as heretofore he did, when he composed his Laws; and he was very glad to hear from the Princess of Armenia, that this Sage Scythian was in the Army: Did I not fear, said Cyrus; That I make this Princess stay too long, I should entreat you to tell me what it was which Anacharsis said unto Solon; for certainly since he thinks it worthy of his memory, so long it is something that is worthy the knowing: It is so Sir (replied Silamis) And since he said it, all the world makes use of it, when they talk upon the same subject. What I then said was yet so simple, replied Anacharsis, that it does not deserve the honor of remembrance: Since the Princess of Armenia is a Lady of an admirable wit, replied Cyrus, and began to walk, she shall be judg, and I will entreat Silamis to tell it in her presence: And indeed after Cyrus had saluted that Princess, after he had presented Anacharsis unto her, and told her of Silamis, whom she said came the day before, he beseeched her to judg whether Solon and all the accomplished men of Athens, had reason to remember some words which Anacharsis had spoken unto that wise Legislator when he was at that famous City. The Athenians (replied Onesile) have a reputation of such excellent wit, as it is to be believed, that whatsoever they think worthy of remembrance, certainly does merit to be so by all the world.

After this, Cyrus turning towards Anacharsis, pressed him to tell what it was he said to Solon: Truly Sir, said he unto him, What I then said unto him, seemed then so unreasonable, that there must needs happen some great change before he could change his opinion; Such a change hath happened at Athens, replied Silamis, that you need not wonder he should change his opinion, & that he should see that you knew better then he did the nature of the people, whom he pretended to govern by the sole authority of his Laws: Truth is Sir, replied Anacharsis then, that seeing what the manners of the Athenians were, and also considering all the men in general, I thought it strange, that a man so wise as Solon, who well enough knew the impetuosity of all passions which disorder the lives of men, and who also knew how audacious and stupid the multitude is, that he should pretend to establish order amongst so great a people, and to make Concord and Virtue reign amongst them only by his Laws: So that when he alledged unto me his Laws, as remedies against all the evils of his Country. Ah Solon (said I, and looked earnestly upon him) Laws are but ingenious Nets which catch the little flies, and let the great ones escape, being easily broken by force: So that I do foresee by all the certain conjectures that Science can give, that weak ones only observe Laws, and strong ones break them, and at last bring them unto such a contemptible condition as they are kept by none, unless the Law of Arms, and fear compel them to be observed more then Justice can. I wonder not at all, said Cyrus, that these words should be remembered, and as for my part I shall never forget them. Doubtless, said the Princess Onesile, they are most worthy to be remembered, And the more, replied Silamis, because the event doth shew that Anacharsis was in the right: For truly the Laws of Solon were very ill observed in his absence, and since his return, things are grown into such disorder, the Pisistrates who was only a Citizen of Athens, is at this day the Master of it. Then is he not the friend of Solon (replied Anacharsis.) Page 134 Pardon me Sir (replied Silamis) But I cannot tell whether Solon be his or no, though he see him sometimes, and give him counsel. This seems to me, replied Onesile, very strange news, that Athens should not be free: And to me more strange (replied Cyrus, that Pisistrates should subject it: For when I knew him at Athens, he was of such an humour, that I could not think him a man so much applied unto business, as to bring about so great a design, for when I saw him, he was wholly devoted unto pleasures: 'Tis true, I stayed but a while at Athens, and so am not able to judg rightly of him: Sir (replied Silamis) Pisistrates cannot be so easily known as another man may, for certainly it may most truly be said of him, that he is three or four several different men. However, though those who are most zealous for liberty do call him the Tyrant of Athens, yet I must needs affirm him to be a man of as much merit as any in the world; and since the Commonwealth hath lost her liberty, it is advantageous unto it, to be subject unto Pisistrates, whose life is such a miscellaneous mystery, that one may make several relations of him, all true, and yet not resemble one another: For he who will relate only the actions of his valour, will give an Idea of Valour it self: To report all his intrigues and factions he hath been in, is to make a description of a turbulent, unquiet, and ambitious man: To relate his sweetness, his sincerity, his generosity, his liberality, and his magnificence, is to make the picture of a true man of Honor; and to tell of his Loves and Gallantries, is to make a model of a most pleasing Lover, and great Gallant.

This Character of Pisistrates, replied Onesile, fills me full of curiosity to know all his adventures: Silamis is so well acquainted with them, replied Menesiphiles; that he knows them as well as Pisistrates himself. Since so (said Cyrus) I shall entreat him, as he desires me to be his friend, so that he will relate it unto the Princess of Armenia: Sir, since Fame long since did wholly devote me yours, replied Silamis, you may command me any thing: Since I use only entreaties to my friends, answered Cyrus, I shall not command you, but I shall entreat you in the name of the Armenian Princess, to relate the life of Pisistrates. But since it is likely that the wise Anacharsis would think his time ill spent, in hearing a history of Love, I will advise him to go and visit the Queen of Pontus.

At first Anacharsis would not go, saying, That whatsoever was worthy the ear of Cyrus, was worthy to be hearkened unto by all the world. But Silamis having given him a Letter from Solon which he longed to read again, because he read it hastily before, he was not sorry for having that pretence of going out. So that obeying Cyrus, he retired. And as soon as he was gone, Onesile solicited Silamis to keep his word, and Cyrus pressing him also, he prepared himself to satisfy their curiosities: And after he had a while recollected his memory, and digested into a method what he was to say, he began his relation in this manner, speaking unto Onesile by the order of Cyrus.

The History of PISISTRATES.

Since I know Madam, that I speak unto one who does not only know the passages of that Country where she lives, but also knows as much as is requisite for any great Princess, I shall omit many things in my relation which I should have inserted, had I spoken unto a person ignorant in the affairs of Greece. Also since it is the History of Pisistrates which I am to relate, and not the history of Athens, I need not insist long upon the General Affairs of our Commonwealth, but shall only say what it pertinent unto Pisistrates. But Madam, since Noble Birth is a great advantage when virtue adorns it with its lustre, I must tell you, that his is as worthy of him, as he is of them from whom he is descended, for he comes from the right line of one of the Sons of Ajax, called Philaeus, who was a Citizen of Athens with his Brother named Eurisaces, who gave the Isle of Sallamine unto the Athenians. And I can assure you, that his heart is higher then his birth, and there are few men in all Greece of greater qualities then he. As for his person, it did infinitely please, and he had all the features of a sweet face: 'Tis true, his Nose was a little taller than the biggest, and raised in the middle, but no more then was an ornament; and certain it is, <◇> could not have a more Noble and finer Ayre then Pisistrates had, especially when he was not in his negligent garb, or on one of those daies when he was so different from himself, that one could hardly know him; and then, when he was in one of Page 135 those melancholy and sluggish humours, he would not be only negligent in his habit, but also seemed to be another man, his hair which was fair seemed brown, and not curled; his making which was handsome, was less pleasing, and there was such a strange carelessness in every part of his person, as one would have said his spirit was no more in his body, then he was Pisistrates. But on one of those daies when he was himself, a man of a more high carriage, and more noble and sweet ayre, could not be seen. Moreover Madam, he was not only wont to be different from himself, at some certain times and daies, but also his very heart was full of contrarieties, and opposite inclinations; for he would be merrier, and he would be melancholy, and he was of a hot temper, though he loved idleness. Moreover, it must needs be said in his commendations, that he had wit in abundance, a wit in fashion, a cultivated wit; but it must be said also, That though he was of a sluggish humour, yet he was the most active man alive, when the fancy took him, for he was able to turn the whole course of his life, to sleep when he should wake, and to wake when he should sleep, yet naturally he loved rest; and when he took it, he took it with more tranquility then another; yet this love of rest was no hindrance, but he could easily throw himself into the tumult of business, and he had such a delicate and sharp spirit, that he could not endure the Government of any one, but would be continually complaining against those who had the administration of affairs whatsoever they were: So that though he had the publique good for his object, and though his own intentions were very good, yet sometimes he would act as if they were not, and be conversant with such as were the most turbulent fellows in the Commonwealth: Yet for all this, he loved all manner of pleasures, not only those of a high and Noble strain, but also the most rustic and childish: It pleased him extremely to see Shepherds dance after a shawm, under a shadow in a green Meadow; he would play for pins with a boy, and rather then fail, divert himself with the meanest things. Moreover, custom was so prevalent with him, that sometimes it held the place of reason, merit, and beauty: And indeed, he did so accustom himself unto the places where he dwelt, to the streets he walked, to the houses he went unto, to the Porters who opened the Gates, to the Slaves he met, and to the persons he did visit, more then ever any man did accustom himself. And this custom was so strong in him, that some ugly eyes which he hath accustomed himself to look upon, hath pleased him better then the fairest eyes in the world which he seldom sees, and is out of the Quarters he uses to inhabit; yet sometimes he would be very variable in his pleasures, sometimes liming would be his predominate fancy, and he did nothing else but go from Painter to Painter, from Closet to Closet, and to discourse of that Art: Otherwhiles Musique would have its turn, and he would wholly devote himself unto harmony; another while dancing was all his fancy, and his imagination was filled with Balls and meetings: Then again, he would be in Love with Books, and Poetry was his Mistress, and he had such an excellent memory, that he was able to quote all that was excellent in any Author he had read.

Thus passing from one passion to another, Solon told him one day merrily, in chiding him for his inconstancy, that he had loved all the Muses one after another, even from Melpomene unto Ptersichore. Moreover Madam, Pisistrates was not onely a Lover of Verse, but also he composed them most excellently and gallantly, Solon himself applauded him; but the most commendable quality in Pisistrates was, that he was as good, as zealous, and as faithful a friend as ever any could be, he was magnificent and liberal, he was brave and generous, and though he was more ambitious then he thought himself, yet he had an uninterested soul; and the greatest fault that could be laid in the dish of Pisistrates was, that he was too much wedded to his own opinions, and to believe too easily, that whatsoever he thought, would happen as he did imagine it. Moreover, Pisistrates had one quality which I forgot to mention, which was, that when he was accustomed unto any one, absence could never unaccustom him, and though he had not seen one of his friends for ten years, yet whensoever fortune brought them together, he would speak to them with as much familiarity, as if he had seen them every day, and would talk of things past, as if he could not live without them; yet for all this, he could be long without seeing or sorrowing for them; So I think, that I had reason to say at the beginning of my discourse, that there was a hundred things in his humour, and way which seemed to be incompatible. And yet for all that, he was a most excellent compleat man; and I am confident Madam, that after this discription of Pisistrates, you will wonder he should ever think of making himself Lord of Athens, since it is not likely a man so much devoted Page 136 to pleasures, of an unbasssed soul, one who loved Solon so well, should <...> of usurping Sovereign Authority. But Madam, when I have related his adven <...> will wonder much more, and admire how one heart could contain so much amb <...> so much love. I shall not trouble you Madam, with relating the beginnings of Pi <...> his life, though they were with much glory; for he did signalize himself at the enterprize of Salamine, and did many other Noble Acts: But let me in few words tell you <◇> that at seventeen years of age his Father forced him to marry, and within three years after his Wife died.

This Marriage being made by force without love, and only an act of obedience unto his Father, no passages happed whilst it lasted worthy to be related unto you. But MaJdam, after he had sacrificed his liberty this first time unto his family, he would sacrifice it unto himself the second time, as you shall know by the sequel of the story; yet its fit you know, that his Mother and Solons being neer Cozens, he received the Sapient Docu]ments of this famous man even from his very cradle, yet this was no hinderance unto his matter of Gallantry: For besides that, Solon was no Enemy unto love, he affected and desired that the youth of Athens might more set their minds upon matters of Gallantry; then matters of ambition, and it would more conduce to the liberty of his Country: For truly (said he one day unto Thales when he was in our City) as long as Pisistrates, and all the rest of his volley are Slaves unto our Beauties, they will never think of making us theirs. So that Madam, Pisistrates being naturally gallant, and not being restrained from it any manner of way, no not by the Councils of a man whom he thought (and with reason) to be Sovereignly wise, he devoted himself wholly unto pleasures, and laid hold upon every occasion of diverting both himself and others: 'Tis true, there were some that said, that at that time he thought upon making himself Lord of Athens, and that he carried it so only to colour his designs: But Pisistrates himself said, that Fortune brought him to that height he was by her own fancy, without any long premeditation. However it were, Pisistrates was no sooner absolute Master of himself, but he seemed to think upon nothing but passing away his time merrily; and certainly he was in a place the fittest in the world for it: For Madam, though commonly the Courts of great Kings are more proper for great diversions, then Republicues are, because the Palaces of Princes does more invite men of admirable parts, then they can be in a place where the power is divided; yet I assure you, Athens was then in so high a lustre, that there were few places in the world where one could more fully divert themselves: For besides, that the business of whole Greece was done at Athens, which caused a huge concourse of strangers, there was also by a favourable constellation abundance of most lovely women, and so many wits of both Sexes at that time, as if the Gods had sent them all at once to honour our Country: Also peace and tranquility looked as if it would last for ever. The Laws of Solon were then religiously observed, though there happened some disorder in his absence; peace, plenty and abundance flourished then in Athens more then in any place of the world; yet the Cylonian Conspiracy, which made such a ring in the world, had yet left some sparks in the embers, and served for a pretence of all our divisions: Not that by reason of all the past divisions there was not any disposition to any new ones in the minds of most men; but since it was lately since the first disorders were appeased, there was so great a calm in appearance, as put all those who loved quietness in hopes that it would last long: So that now nothing was feared but that sleeping peace would rust us: But amongst the youngsters of highest rank, Pisistrates was the most considerable: Licurgus and Theocritus who were men of the first form, and sons unto one called Aristalas, were also in high esteem, though of different humours; and there was another, whose name was Ariston, who was infinitely pleasing. As for the Ladies, amongst that multitude of ornaments unto our City, Cleorante who was Daughter unto a man very consi]derable in Athens called Megacles, held the first rank as well as Cerinthe, daughter unto Philombrotus, and Euridamia, the Kinswoman of Solon. But Madam, I beseech you, give me leave to let you know them according to the order, as Pisistrates came to know them, and in order to that, I must tell you, that though our City was under the protection of Minerva, yet she held Cere in particular veneration; and indeed, she had a very famous Temple in Athens; and every year there was celebrated two Feasts unto her honor, which we called Thesmophoria, where women are the principal actors of the ceremony: For besides several other austerities, they would watch nine nights together in the Temple of this Goddess, and in honour of Ceres, they would there be dressed as if they Page 137 were going to a Ball: So that this Temple being very beautiful and enlightened with a thousand Lamps, it was a most glorious sight to view these Ladies when they watched nine nights until after midnight; and there was not a man of any quality but he was there; men of age came only to honor the Goddess, and the young men came more in devotion to the Ladies then to Ceres. One of these nights then, Pisistrates, unto whom I was a piece of a friend, made a motion to go thither, and I having nothing else to do, went with him: Pisistrates then had no particular Engagement upon him more then I had. But as soon as we had placed our selves by chance, more then out of any affected choice, the lovely Cerinthe, Daughter of Philombrotus, who followed her mother, came and sat next us, and was so very pleasant, that though she spoke not unto us, yet she seemed by the ayr wherewith she received our salute, that she was not sorry we were so neer her: For Madam, you must know, there was not any person in the world who had such significant actions as she; and indeed with a wink of her eye, a nod of her head, or sign with her hand, she could commend or dispraise, and make others understand a thousand several things. Moreover, Cerinthe though brown and little, yet she was infinitely amiable, all the features of her face were delicate and fair, her cheeks fresh, her eyes quick, her ayr sprightly and pleasant, and for her bigness majestic; her physiognomy did not deceive one, she had wit in abundance, and was infinitely merry.

She being such a piece as I have described, you may imagine Madam that we were not ill placed since next her: But her mother being a mighty precise piece of austerity, as soon as we began to say something concerning our good fortune, she imposed silence, and said nothing, but it was in such an obliging manner, though she spoke only in the language of her eyes, that yet we easily perceived, if she had not stood more in fear of her Mother then the Goddess, she would have gladly answered us. Thus this first sight of her being passed, Pisistrates and I retired, murmuring much against the mother of Cerinthe; for we knew well enough, that but for her, we should have had some discourse du]ring the intervals of the ceremony: However, though Cerinthe was very fair in the eyes of Pisistrates, yet he never so much as thought upon her the next day, nor went he unto the Temple.

But the third day going thither alone, and betimes, he chanced to sit next Cerinthe again, though not in the same place where he saw her first, and to his happiness her Mother was not then with her, but there was with her a Kinswoman which was not of so Pu]ritanical a temper. Pisistrates no sooner saw her next him, but coming very respectfully to her ear: You did so cruelly forbid me Madam the other day to express my joyes of being need you (said he unto her) That I cannot tell whether you permit it now: It is so great a happiness (replied she) to be in a multitude, and sit next a man of excellent parts, that I believe Ceres will pardon me if I should import one minute in receiving your civilities unto me. A minute Madam is so very little (replied he) that if you allow me no more, I shall be but ill satisfied: Should you spend a whole day here (replied she and smiled) perhaps you would think minutes very long: Yet Madam, I finde something in your eyes (replied he) which makes me think I could spend my whole life here with much delight: Fie Pisistrates (said she turning her head aside, and imposing silence upon him with her hand) I will not hear you any longer: Yet Cerinthe was not so good as her word, for she still listned from time to time unto what Pisistrates said: 'Tis true, she did not answer, but still charged him to be silent: But Madam, from that night Pisistrates did accustom himself to see Cerinthe, and did it with abundance of care as long as the nine daies ceremony lasted: So that at the end of this Feast they were grown intimate friends. Pisistrates was extreemly vexed, that as long as this ceremony lasted, Ladies received no vi]sits: So that as great a desire as he had to see Cerinthe at her own house, he must wait until the nine daies were past. But as soon as they were over, Pisistrates went unto the wife of Philombrotus, who received him very well, and desired that her Daughter should also receive him with much civility, for she knew that her Husband was desirous to get such friends as Pisistrates.

Cerinthe being of a very merry composition, and naturally loved Rallary, Pisistrates and she fell into great familiarity the first visit. And since several serious persons came in, who took up the mother of Cerintae, Pisistrates talked much more freely then he had done, if the company had been more general, he engaged himself into no discourse but with her, not that he thought himself in love with her, nor indeed was he very much; but the truth is, he had that kinde of amorous accustomancy towards her, of which I Page 138 told you before he was apt for; and she had towards him that first favourable inclination which is often seconded with a violent passion: So that Pisistrates being that day in one of his merry fits, and Cerinthe being (as usually she was) frolique, they were not wealy of one another.

At first they discoursed of all they had seen in the Temple during the nine daies Feast: Of such Lovers as were wrong placed in being far from those they loved, or of some jealous husbands which they had seen, who had never been there but to see who was with their wives: So that after many an innocent Satyre, and manya pleasant discription, Pisistrates upon a suddain interrupted Cerinthe, and said unto her, I pray Madam, after you have talked of every one you have seen in the Temple of Ceres nine daies together, why do you not speak one word of me? I profess Pisistrates, said she and smiled, you are the strangest man in the world to ask such a question, for what can I say of you, but that you very ill obeyed me when I did forbid you talking? and you were the least devout in all the assembly. All this is true Madam (replied he) but this is not all you can say of me; for I am confident that as you saw some Lovers who could not sit next their Mistresses, and some Husbands looking who were with their wives, so you saw as well, that you were already very deep in my heart: I do protest unto you, said she and laughed, I did not so much as see my self in your eyes: It was not long of me Madam, replied Pisistrates, for I looked in yours as much as possibly I could, and endeavoured to let you see in mine, that I did you Justice, and thought you far fairer then all I could see besides: Your eyes Sir, replied she, may tell lyes as well as your tongue can slatter: And to punish you (ad]d she and laughed) I could almost wish all you say were true, and that you were deeply in love with me, for I have had a long longing curiosity to see a man really in Love: Oh Madam, said he unto her, certainly you are not sincere, for it is impossible but that you have seen many Lovers, since you are neither blinde nor invisible: But to speak in your own terms, I am the most mistaken man alive, if your curiosity be not quickly satisfied; for if I be not yet in love with you, yet I dare swear that it wants so little of it, that two looks more will fully do it: Do not think Sir, said she being excellent at Rallary, that when I say I long to see a Lover, I mean such Lovers as say they are in Love, but are not, for I have no desire to see such a one: But on the contrary, I mean such a Lover as is able to do all that the most violent passion in the world can make one do: What do you mean Madam, said he? I mean, said she, that he should (if occasion present it self) kill himself, throw himself down a precipice, and poyson himself for very despair. But MaJdam, replied Pisistrates, I pray tell me which one of these three testimonies of Love would you have a man give you, if you should make him in Love? For, said he and laughed, a man cannot kill himself, throw himself down a Precipice, and poyson himself all at once. But Madam, to tell you truly, added he, methinks I see too much joy in your eyes, to desire any such tragical testimonies as these: And I am the most mistaken man in the world, if you would not take more delight in some musique which a Lover should present unto you, then in seeing him kill himself; and therefore Madam be pleased to make an ingenijous confession, that you do not desire any such sad signs of Love; for I must needs confess, that I take such infinite pleasure in seeing you, as if you should require it, I should not obey you. Truly Pisistrates, said she, your sincerity does please me; yet I must tell you, that then you must be no other then my friend, for if I should wish you my Lover, I should wish you also to be such a one as I mean; to wit, pale, sober, grave and melancholy, sometimes quiet, disordered, and reserved; and indeed to be the most miserable man in the world, I would not have you one of those who can play with a Feather, and divert themselves at every thing: However Madam, said Pisistrates, I beseech you receive me as your Lover, and afterwards I will try if I can become conformable to your desires. But Madam, you must not think I can grow pale, lean, sober and melancholy in four and twenty hours: No, no Sir, said she and laughed, I am not so unreasonable, I will allow you fifteen daies to fall in love with me, and fifteen daies more after that to become such a pitifull Lover as I desire out of curiosity to see; for since I am none of those great beauties who wound in an instant, you will stand in need of all this time to become only a little reserved: But if at the expiration of this moneth which I allow you, added she, you are not become the most pitifull puling Lover in the world, you must give me leave to think you will never be such a one: But Madam, said he unto her, since it does depend wholly upon you whether I must be happy or miserable, it is not in me to promise whether I shall, or shall not be so; but I am able to engage my self, to be more in Love with you then ever any was; and to be sincere with you, if my Love should encrease as it hath Page 139 done this last quarter of an hour, I shall not need halfe fifteen days to become the most passionate lover upon Earth. Seriously Pisistrates (said she unto him) I should be very angry, if you speak truly; for to discover the very bottom of my heart unto you, I care not for such real loves, as for such as think they are so and are not, and yet make much more noyse of it then those who really are: for I think it does reflect much upon a wolmans honor, to admit of such a crowd of Adorers, as many most vainly do. Yet me-thinks Madam (replied Pisistrates) It is a honor to Reign Sovereignly over the hearts of so many men. I do assure you Sir, much less then you do imagine (replied Cerinthe) for to tell you truly, I am confident that when one is young, and not altogether ugly, one may with a very mean merit, so they have any handsomeness, make themselves followed, and get a Troop of most assiduous lovers: since certainly that is not any effect of great beauty or wit; but depends only upon some certain petty effected indulgencies, and a kind of Air which is most fit to attract, which makes men seem more then friends, and dare not see such women without applauding their sweetness: On the contrary, I dare affirm, that without this attractive behaviour, the fairest person in the world and the most charming, shall never have this multitude of lovers: So that since I think, many lovers are no effects or arguments of extraordinary merit in such as have them; but rather of their weakness, I should be very sorry to have any such: And though I tell you I long to have one, yet I had much rather never see him, then to be perpetually importuned with such complaints, as I can never satisfie: and I am so afraid to meet with any such, that I dare not make my self any friends, least they should afterwards change the nature of friendship into love at last. For ought I see Madam (replied Pisistrates) my destiny is changed in a short time, since within this quarter of an hour, you desired to see a lover, and now forbids me being your friend. I assure you Sir, (said she and laughed) I think it so good to have no acquaintance, that I think it would be a very ill office to make me alter my opinion. For my part Madam, (replied Pisistrates) I shall not oppose your humour of having no friends, and of not affecting to have an infinite number of lovers; but I must confess I cannot endure that you should not entertain one, or that I should not be that one.

As Cerinthe was ready to reply, those Ladies who were talking with her mother, being gon, their discourse was interrupted. Yet Cerinthe being of a merry nature, and one that loved Rallary, she knew so well how to carry the matter, without saying either yea or no, unto Pisistrates, that he continued seeing her he much delight; for he was so deeply in love with Cerinthe, that he took a greater pleasure in talking with her, then in any other in the world; yet not so far as to have all the inquietudes of a violent passion; but on the contrary was always much joyed; for he saw Cerinthe every day, who chusing him for her companion in Rallary, made him the gladdest man alive, by her thousand pleasant conceits, which she told him upon several subjects. But Madam, that you may the better understand what did most contribute unto their diversions a long time, be pleased to know, that Theocrites of whom I spoke before, who was second son unto Aristolas, was extremely in love also with Cerinthe, but in such a manner, as made her extremely merry, and acquaint Pisistrates with a hundred of her conceits. Not but that Theocrite was very handsome and had spirit enough: but being naturally of a grave, Sage and serious temper, he talked of love, as if he were upon some politique negotiation, and he loved as if he were in Print. Indeed, Madam, he was one of those lovers, who would ask a pardon if he did but sigh a little too loud; you may imagine that such a man was sport enough to Cerinthe. In the mean time: as frolique as she was, the Lady who of all the Town, did most visit her, was Euridamia, kinswoman unto Solon, who was a person so serious, and cold, whose eyes were always in a languishing melancholy, which was one of her greatest charmes, though she had many others; for Euridamia was fair, and had abundance of wit, and of a sweet and pleasing spirit. So it seemed as if fortune took delight to oppose the seriousness of Euridamia, and the gravity of Theocrite against the Gagey of Cerinthe, to make it seem the more: And that she had also infused into Pisistrates, several things, which did sympathize with the seriousness of Euridamia, and the merriness of Cerinthe: and he did equally accustom himself to see them both, and they were both more or less pleased with him, in their turnes, according to the humour he was in; for when he was melancholy, then he would sit by Euridamia, and when he was merry, he was all for Cerinthe: However, certain it is, that at first, he made a further progress into the heart of the melancholy one, then into the heart of the merry, though she also esteemed Pisistrates more then any other. For my part, I was every day in their company, Page 140 and I took a strange delight to see how odly love had ordered things between these four persons. For it seemed as if Theocrites had been purposely cut out to love Euridamia, by reason of the sutableness in their melancholies, it seemed also that Cerinthe should be most moved by the merit of Pisistrates, and not Pisistrates with hers: yet it was the pleasure of Cupid, to make the melancholy person love the merry: That Pisistrates should almost love both the serious, and the jocond; and that the merry one should almost love none. For my part, I was the happiest in the company; for I was in such favour with all these persons, that they made all their complaints unto me as occasions fell out: Indeed, Pisistrates would often complain that he thought Theocrites was too often with Cerinthe: Cerinthe also she complained against the too frequent visits of this over serious lover, because he said, that she did not give her time to rally after her own way, against love: Theocrites on his side, he complained that he was forced to love a person, whose humour was so opposite unto his own: And Euridamia also accused Cerinthe for geering at all sorts of men, not sparing her very friends: 'Tis true, she did so, even before her face as well as behind her back: and I remember one day when Cerinthe was in one of her pleasant humours, she began to counterfet Theocrites, and to act his manner of speaking and action, even to his very looks: So that Euridamia perceiving how she pleased Pisistrates, she could not chuse but check her Rallary, perhaps as much out of a resentment of jealousy, as Justice. I profess Cerinthe (said she unto her) you comit a most horrible piece of injustice, in treating Theocrite after this manner; I do profess (replied Cerinthe and laughed) you are much more unjust then I am, in offering to do an ill office both unto Theocrites and me: For I swear, if I should not laugh in his absence at a hundred of his actions, I should not endure his presence. Therefore if you think he loves me, and that my presence pleaseth him, you must let me laugh at his melancholy; for when all is done, still I will say that Theocrites is a man of much honor; but to think that when I see him all gravity from morning till night: or to harken a whole day to his serious sighs, and that I should not laugh at them and please my self: This is the way to be neither friend unto Theocrite nor me, since you would make him much more melan|choly, and deprive me of much delight. For my part (said Pisistrates then) I think the fair Cerinthe in the right: and for my part, (added I) I am of Euridamia's opinion, and thinks there's nothing more inhumane then to gear a poor lover. To speak seriously (said Euridamia then) I think no Rallary to be innocent: then am I very often to blame (replied Cerinthe) for I must confess, that I find no company so pleasing as that where there is a kind of agreeable malice mixed in it, which makes it more merry and full of life; and to speak seriously, if any Rallary be innocent, it is at a serious and grave lover: gallantry without mirth and jocundry is a thing so extravagant, as I wonder every one should not laugh at it; for certainly it were no odder thing to see the general Counsel of all Greece to fall a dancing when they should talk of State matters, then to see a lover and a gallant of a severe and grave garb: since you are not ignorant that you can Rally handsomely (replied Euridamia out of spite, seeing Pisistrates laugh at what Cerinthe said, you think that you may without any scruple Rally thus as you do: And I am confident you think all that can be pleasing, must be spoken in Rallary. Fie Euridamia (replied she) that's too far; yet I must confess, it is a piece of difficulty, to keep up any pleasant thought in ones mind, which one knows they can well vent; and to tell you truly I think it argues more delicacy of wit to Rally handsomely, then to do many things which seem more difficult. It must needs be confessed (added Pisistrates) that it argues much wit to turn things handsomely as they please: and it is sometimes more delight to be geared by you, then to be applauded by another. It is certain (added I) that Cerinthe is admirable good at it when she pleaseth: but it is as certain also, that many persons will be meddling with Rallary, who ought not. For my part (said Euridamia) I will go further then you, and say again, that almost no Rallary can be innocent; and whosoever gets a habit of it, are in great danger to lose all friendship, all honesty and all goodness. Really (said Cerinthe and laughed) you use me very cruelly: I use you according as you deserve (replied Euridamia) not but that I know very well there is a kind of Gallant Rallary, which hath less; malignity in it then others have: but I will maintain, that whosoever useth to Rally often, does walk upon precipices: and it is the bard|est thing in the world to walk even, and do it well without danger or wronging the Laws of friendship and goodness, and without wronging themselves also: For it is a thing almost impossible to use it without hatred or at least feared, and the very truth is, none are Page 141 allowed to use it; also I do know very few men who are just subjects of Rallary. How? (said Cerinthe) will you defend all men in the world? I assure you (replied Euridamia) I would have none forsake you.

For first, pursued she, I would not have one jest, not only upon their particular friends, but also not upon their acquaintance: First chuse them well, and be as nice as you please in the choice, but when you have chosen them, by no means play upon them, I cannot allow of their opinions, who will not spare those whom they love best in the world: For in my opinion it is most dangerous to divert ones self at the expences of ones friends. However, said Pisistrates, you will give Cerinthe leave to play upon her Enem|ies; Truly, replied Euredamia, I cannot allow that more then upon friends, for Rallary is the poorest kinde of revenge that can be rendered: For ought I see (said Cerinthe) you will not allow one so much as to rally with ones self: I assure you, replied she, though that be the most harmless Rallary that can be, yet if it be not done with abundance of judgment, it will be found no great diversion, and surely it is a more difficult matter to play upon ones self, then upon any other. Moreover, added she, I cannot allow any rally upon such as are men of mean or no merit, for it is never handsom; nor do I allow it upon men of parts, because it were injustice to descant upon one slight fault, in prejudice of a thousand good qualities: But if one will needs be rallying, let it be upon ones self, but never speak any thing that may anger, or any thing that will do more then a little animate conversation, for in that case I confess it is allowable to chide ones best friends. But Cerinthe, how few men are there who knows how to rally either wittily or innocently? And truly I do not wonder at it, for the talent must be born with them, no art can infuse it; and whosoever will force his naturals, will be so far from diverting others with his Rallary, that he will be the subject of Rallary himself: It is not so in any other pleasing qualities of wit, since they may be all acquired by pains and study; but as for the gift of rally, Nature only must give it, and Judgment must guide it: It is not enough to have many pleasant thoughts, but there must be also such an expression as must render them agreeable; the ay, the aspect, the tone, and every part in general must contribute. I should never have thought, said Pisistrates, that a person so serious as Euridamia is, could speak so well of a quality she never practiseth: On the contrary, replied she, I ought to be more believed because I rally not; for having no interest in it, I speak without any passion, and examine of kinds of Rallary without injustice unto any: But to tell you truly, except one of my friends who hath a most admirable delicacy of wit and fancy, I know none but Cerinthe whom I will allow to rally: Truth is (said I then) there is nothing more insufferable then such men as are always slandering, and whose whole thoughts are rally, who think because they grosly rub upon the faults of others, therefore they are good at rally: There are another sort of scurrilous men, replied Pisistrates, who make me mad when I meet with them, for all their delight consists in a Popular and base way of talk, which fills the imagination with nothing but villanous things, and which make it apparent unto all who hear them, that they have spent the greatest part of their lives in the very worst company of the world. Ah Pisistrates (said Cerinthe) you delight me extremely to hear you hate such men; for though I do defend Rallary in general, yet I should forsake all manner of Jocundry, rather then such should be permitted, especially this you speak of in particular; for the truth is, I would have Rallary to be gallant, and have a little touch of malice; but yet I would have it modest and delicate, that it wound neither the ears, nor the imagination, and that it make one blush only for anger: There are yet another sort of Jestes, replied Euridamia, who tyer my patience when I meet them; for their fancy is to play upon all, so that racking their wits to finde an occasion, they bring out a thousand tedious things for one of any conceipt in it; and for three or four happy Jestes which they had broken in all their lives, you shall hear a hundred thousands bad ones from them: For my part; replied I, I met once with a man who madded me with his continual repetitions of what he thought he had wittily said, and it was such a jest, as I dare swear I have heard above a hundred times before: I cannot endure those Tale-tellers, added Pisistrates, who alwayes laugh first at their own tale, and who should laugh alone if they never told them unto any but me. After all this, said Euridamia, there is another sort the most tedious of all, since in my opinion nothing is more unhandsom, then a certain kinde of faint cold Rallary which is good for nothing, such as when they see those they talk with have a design to be pleasant, yet they will not be so, nothing can be more tyersome then this. These tellers of long tedious stories, replied I, who Page 152 bring in a hundred impertinencies for one pleasing passage, are a most troublesome sort of people, though they themselves are very pleasing, and it is so hard a matter to speak neither too much nor too little, in telling a long story, that few men can do it well. These great men of old Proverbs, replied Euridamia, are very impertinent, not but that when a Proverb is aptly applied, it is very pleasing, but when the Proverb is nought or ill applied, it has a contrary effect. For my part, added Cerinthe, That as errant fools as they are, yet they serve to divert me; for though they talk much, and laugh at what themselves say and think, though they make a great noyse, and talk harshly, I can laugh as heartily at them as if they were the best company in the world: But the reason why you laugh, replied Euridamia, is because you are naturally merrie, and finde an ample mat[ter of Rallary upon those who do it ill-favouredly. However, added Pisistrates, we ought to be all of Euridamia's opinion, for since Rallary is a thing so difficult to be done well, she has good reason to say that it is very dangerous to use it often. I do agree, said Cerinthe, that bad Rallary is to be condemned, and that the Satyrical, the gross, the cold, and the extravagant is not to be endured; but as for the gallant, delicate, fine, and witty, I shall oppose her, and defend it as far as I am able, and Euridamia must either be absolutely of my opinion, or else directly tell me what sort of Rallary she will permit me to take delight in: I have already told you, replied Euridamia, that there is none which I approve of, though there be some which pleaseth me: Tell me then which please[eth you, said Pisistrates, for I do believe what pleaseth you will please all the world, and though it be only to correct Cerinthe, I beseech you establish the Law of Rallarie, protesting unto you, that I will observe it as exactly as the Laws of Solon. For my part, said Cerinthe and laughed, I will not say so much, and if I am not much mistaken, the same may be said of the Laws which she shall make, as was said by Anacharsis of our Legisla[tor. However (said Euridamia) Since Pisistrates says he will observe them, I will venture to make them: And I do promise also never to break them, said I unto her, provided you give them unto us presently. The word Law does so much fright me, said Euridamia, that I dare hardly pronounce it; and therefore to speak a little more mo[destly, I will only tell you my opinion, and submit unto your own judgments. I shall tell you then, added she, that I would have Rallarie natural, not forced, I would not have any to seek it; for certainly if it come not of it self unprompt for, and without pains, it will never come well and pleasingly off. Moreover, there must be such a great inter[val and difference between Rallarie and Satyrism, that one may never be taken for the other. I know very wel some say, That if Rallarie be not a little biting, it will never take well, but for my part, I consider it otherwise: Truth is, I would have it surprize, and sensible touch him to whom it is addressed, but I would not have the wounds it makes to be too deep, nor prick the hearts of those who resent it, otherwise then those are pricked who gather Roses, and finde a sweet smell to make amends: I would have Rallarie raise the fancie, and quicken the imagination with a wit full of fire, which retaining some part of its original, may shine only as the stars do, but burn not. Again, I would not have one be always in a vein of Rallarie, few long continuances in Rallarie but are naught: But above all, I would have everie one know his talent of wit, and be contented; and therefore those unto whom nature hath not given a nimbleness and quickness either in their actions or feature of face, or in their expressions, are never to meddle with more then she hath given them, for art commonly mars all, let him follow only his own Ge[nius, and not anothers: It is not with Rallarie as with pictures, which sometimes are copied so like the original, that one cannot know the copie from its original; but in matter of Rallarie, there is no imitating another, and therefore let him never attempt it. But to speak something concerning those ill Jesters and tellers of tales which we have condemn[ed, I would have such as tell a tale, never to say it is delightful before hand; I would have the tale to be either very natural, or else verie witty and pertinent, that the beginning be not more pleasant then the ending, and above all things, I would have it new and short. Those who are to make long stories, I would have them do it with art and method, that they suspend the minds of their Auditors, and if it be possible to deceive them, in ending their discourse contrarie to their expectations: But principally let them not use any im[pertinencies, let not their eloquence be either intricate or drailing, but on the contrary, let them pass from one thing to another without puzzle or confusion, and not to inter[rupt themselves too often, in saying, I had forgot to tell you, or by saying, I should have [Page 143 told you, and a hundred such like with such use, as have no method nor order in their thoughts.

Furthermore, I would have them be sure to speak in the language of compleat men, not like those whom Pisistrates did most wisely mention, unless in case he be to imitate how a Slave spoke unto his Master, or so; for then, since imitation is his aim, the neerer he imitates, the more commendable it is. Moreover, I would not have them be too covet[ous of their thoughts, but to take a care as much as possible not to repeat any thing twice. As for such as are full of old Proverbs in their Rallarie, I have already said, that they may be pertinent; and I say again, that if they be natural, pat, and applicative to the business, they much illustrate. But to speak upon that which is positively called Rallary or jesting, I say, that to rally right, is requisite to have a wit full of fire, a quick fancy, a delicate judgment, and a memory full of variety to be used upon all occasions; he must know the world, and please it, he must have a natural nimbleness of wit, and a kinde of bold fa[miliarity, which without any smack of insolence must please, and impose silence upon others. Ah Euridamia, replied Pisistrates, What abundance of wit is requisite to make up such a one as you describe? For my part, said Cerinthe, I believe if she would lay aside her serious humour, not one in all Greece could rally better then she: Seriousness, replied Euridamia, is not so great an obstacle unto fine Rallary as you imagine; for I once knew a man, who had such a languishing ayr with him, so melancholy and so dull a garb, as I never saw the like; and yet he was the fullest of pleasant wit and gallant Rallary, that ever I saw man in my life like him. Now though I have hinted unto you how one ought to rally, yet I must repeat what I said before, and maintain that one ought to have a great care how he rallies, especially upon his friends, yet there is one general rule which will never fail, which is, to say nothing of such as one would not willingly have them un[derstand, and never to say any thing of themselves so biting as to hinder the delight of such as hear him; for it is not just to say any thing of your friends which will please others more then them, nor to put them into such a necessity as to reply such things as will please you less then the company, for friend is so nice a matter, that one cannot too much fear the wounding it; and indeed to speak rationally, these biting quiblets do not make the best rally. The delight any takes in them, proceeds more from the malignity of their own inclinations, then from any right art of Rallary; and certainly a trifle hand[somely retorted, is more fit for pleasant Rallary then a Satyrical invective, whose name is only changed and called Rallary: It is no fault to be ill at Rallary, but it is a grand one to lose ones friend rather then his jest: All you say, replied Cerinthe, is so like the Cozen of Solon, that I think he left you all his wisdom when he went out of Athens. I am sure, said Pisistrates, She has spoken all according to the rule of good and sound reason: I know but too much for my satisfaction (replied Cerinthe) for if I should regulate my self according to her documents, I should never speak as long as I live: It would be too great a loss to impose silence upon you Madam (replied I) since few can speak so well.

As I said so, Theocrite entred in Querpo, with a most majestique gravity, which turned the discourse, and presently parted the company; for Euridamia going away, Pisistrat[es whom she had pleased very well that day, presented his hand unto her, and I follow[ing presently after, we left Cerinthe with her melancholy Lover, whom She suffered only to divert her self, and to tell us the next day how grave and seriously he Courted her.

In the mean time, Pisistrates not well knowing whether he was Lover or friend unto Cerinthe or Euridamia, whether he was in Love with one, and a friend to the other, or loved both, he placed himself almost equally poized between these two Ladies: Truth is, it was (as I told you before) according to the humour he was in: As for examyle, on one of those daies when he found fault with all the evils in the Commonwealth, then he was all for Euridamia, and never looked at Cerinthe, but he would complain unto Euridamia of all the ill management of Affa[irs, examining them to the bottom, observing all their defects, and seeking out all remedies, as if what he said unto Euridamia were to be followed: Indeed his Spirits and imagination was as zealous, as if he were perswaded[ing all the people in Athens, and driving the nail more home; he foresaw all the benefits and all the miseries of the Commonwealth according to his thoughts, and made such a subversion of things, that if Fortune had executed his will, none in Athens could have stayed where he was.

Page 144 In the mean time, Pisistrates mixed some matters of Gallantry with his policy: So that Euridamia lent a pleasing ear unto him, and he was very glad of it. But then in one of his merry daies, he would spend it all with Cerinthe, with whom he plotted projects of pleasure and diversion more then policy, walks, balls, musique where the principal de[signs, whole afternoons were spent in Councils how to contrive them, and imagining a thousand other delights: Yet during all these daies of sport, Theocrite and Euridamia were out of tune; yet this grave Lover was much more unhappy then this serious Lover; for she having an infinite wit, knew well enough that Cerinthe had no more power upon the heart of Pisistrates then she had: But as for Theocrite, he knew so well that he had no share in the heart of Cerinthe, that he was troubled to the soul; and yet he saw that this Lady was not capable of any great compliance with any one: But since Pisistrates pleased her more then any other, he grew extremely jealous: But Madam, if Cerinthe had reason to say that a serious Lover was a very odd thing, I am sure that I have more reason to say that a jealous grave lover is no less; and the truth is Madam, a stranger sight could not be seen then Theocrite when he was jealous; for it being a passion which of it self carries melancholy along with it, judg I beseech you what he was, who was naturally so before; but the strangest thing was to see this man so serious, and whose acti[ons were wont to be alwayes so in print, now full of all frivolous cares, and impertinent cu[riosities, that jealousy could inspire unto a man most apt for it. In the mean time, I delighted my self in the sadness of others, and in their joys also; for being then much in favour with Pisistrates, I shared in his diversions; and speaking unto him one day con[cerning Cerinthe and Euridamia, I pressed him to tell how his minde stood affected unto them; They are both of them so much in my minde (replied he) That did I know but one of them, I am perswaded I should be extremely in love with her, but because I equally esteem them both, my heart is not resolved what to do: And I think I may well say, that I do love them much better then I do any other of my friends, and less then a Mistress unto whom I should wholly devote my self. This answer is so strange, replied I and laughed, that I think you give it rather as good conceipt, then as your real thoughts: I do protest, said he unto me, I tell you really what my heart thinks; for if Euridamia had not come unto Cerinthe, when first I knew her, I had then fallen down right in love with her; and if I had known Euridamia and never been acquainted with Cerinthe, I be[lieve I should have loved her most tenderly: Truth is Silamis, said he to me, The jo[cundry of Cerinthe does so much please me, and the melancholy of Euridamia does so much charm me, as I am confident if either of those two should go into the Country for one moneth, I am fully perswaded that I should fall deeply in love with her who stay[ed in Athens. I profess, said I, this is most admirable: Be it what it will, said he, what I say is true: But Sir, said I unto him, How can your minde be divided so between two persons of such opposite humours? These two persons of humours so opposite, replied he, have each of them in their way abundance of merit, and therefore no wonder my minde should be unsettled, and the wonder is the less, because they do not resemble one another, for if they were both merry, or both melancholy, doubtless I should make choice of her whose mirth or melancholy most pleased me: But because I do finde that in the one which I do not finde in the other, I am forced to part my esteem and my affection: And so it may also be said, that I do love them both, or at least have an equal disposition to love them: And indeed Madam Pisistrates lied not, since had it not been for his inclination towards Euridamia, he had in all likelihood fallen in love with Cerinthe, and had it not been for his inclination to Cerinthe, he had fallen also in love with Euridamia.

However; these two Ladies at last perceiving that they themselves were equally obsta[cles, to keep the heart of Pisistrates from each other, they began to love one another much less. Insomuch as Cerinthe who was used to speak of Euridamia, and to say only, that she was very serious, did now say upon several occasions, that she was lumpishly me[lancholy; and Euridamia on her side, who was wont only to say that Cerinthe loved Rall[ary a little too well, accused her now of slandering, and as a lover of mischief; inso[much as this petty division produced divers quarrels between these two Ladies, which strangely perplexed Pisistrates; for they would both of them be forcing him to take their parts, yet he carried it so handsomly, that sometimes condemning the one, and sometimes the other, he became a Judg of their differences, and did not declare him[self.

Page 145 But in the interim of all these squabbles, Theocrites continuing still the gravity of his humour, made no further progress into the heart of Cerinthe then ordinary, and consequently was more miserably then he was used to be. Things standing upon these teams, and Pisistrates still saying, that but for Euridamia he had loved Cerinthe, and but for Cerinthe he had loved Euridamia; I understood that Philombrotus was to go into the Coun[try with his whole family: I no sooner heard this, but I went unto Pisistrates, and ad[ressing my self unto him: Well Sir (said I unto him and laughed) We shall shortly see whether your words be true or no, and whether you will fall in love with Euredamia as soon as Cerinthe is out of your sight, for I understand she is going into the Country: How; said he, Cerinthe into the Country? Yes Sir, answered I, and I understand Philombrotus resolves upon it to morrow: Then am I in a miserably case (said he to me) for I understood yesterday that Euridamia goes away also to morrow; and as you were coming to me, I was saying to my self, That I must prepare to fall in love with Cerinthe during the absence of Euridamia, but for ought I see I am out of that danger since they both go. Since it is not likely (replied I and laughed) that the same chance which caused them to depart both in one day, will make them return also both in one day, I shall not dispair but to see my curiosity satisfied ere it be long, and we shall see whether you will fall in love with her who returns first. In the mean time, Pisistrates thought himself extremely concerned in the absence of both these Ladies; yet since he had rather only a bare amorous inclination towards them, than any real love, he comforted up himself; and being obliged to take a journey himself a little after their departure, change of place helped to dissipate melancholy thoughts: But Madam, I being he of all his friends with whom he held most familiarity, he engaged me to go this journey with him, telling me the more to induce me to it, that he was to go near those famous Bathes which are at the foot of the Mountain Thermopiles, and that we should go thither and divert our selves some daies after he had finished his business: For Madam, be pleased to know, that these Bathes are so famous, that for three monthes an infinite number of persons of greatest quality in all Greece resort thither: Not sick, languishing, and diseased persons: But the opinion of those best known in the virtues of these Bathes, is, that they are more proper to preserve health, then to cure diseases: So that all those who resort thither are in a fit condition for diversions. Moreover, Ladies having a fancy that these Bathes do augment their beauty, or at least preserve it, there is every year a huge resort of them thither under pretence of preventing diseases, though really only to keep longer fair, or at least to divert themselves, for this is a rule in all Bathes, that melancholy is by all means to be banished, and mirth must be made as much as may be: So Madam, since I had never been there, but often heard excellent diversions to be there met with, I accepted of the offer which Pisistrates made unto me. I shall not insist upon telling you what business carried Pisistrates unto Thermopolis, for I must confess he kept it secret from me, yet I thought it was to confer with some who were banished from Athens, which might be useful to him in the change which he hath since brought about, though he would not confess so much unto me: However, I went this voyage with him; and after he had left me two daies with one of his friends whilst he dispatched his unknown business, he returned, and we went unto Thermopiles, which was not above half a daies journey off us. But Madam, it is very requisite I acquaint you both with the place, and the manner how they live at these Bathes for three monthes in the year: Be pleased therefore to know Madam, that very near this mountain of Thermopiles, which parts Greece, and leaves but one narrow and difficult passage by which one can pass from one part of Greece unto the other: Here stands a Town called Alpenes, wherein are many houses commodious for lodging, such as resort to the Bathes; but the place where the Bathes stand, hath in it something both salvage and pleasing: Indeed when one is at that strait passage by which men come from one part of Greece into another, one shall see a most inaccessible mountain, environed with affrighting Precipices, which reach as far as Mount Etna towards the West; and on that side towards the East may the Sea be seen, and a kinde of Marish ground, so full of sources and bogs, as there is no going: 'Tis true, that descending a little lower towards that side which looks towards Artimision, there is a most pleasant Meadow, and though it be in the view of this hideous mountain, and on the other side the Sea, yet there are an infinite number of trees growing about it. Moreover, since it is there where these Bathes are, they have drained away the bogs and marish waters, and conveying them away by several channels, these famous Bathes are preserved: There are also made at both ends of the Meadow [Page 144 <1 page duplicate> Page 145 <1 page duplicate> Page 146 above a hundred, all bathing tubs of Marble, unto which when they please they can convey the water; and since every one who comes unto this Bath brings with them a magnificent Tent to cover over the bath they employ, these several Tents standing in this Meadow do make a most delighting object. But Madam, I forgot to tell you, that the reason why this is so, is because these waters being naturally lue-warm, do lose their virtue if transported, and therefore they must of necessity bath in the same place where they spring: Yet here the Ladies have every one their bath in private, as well as if in their Chambers; and the Tents appointed for the men are at the other end of the Meadow in respect unto the Ladies; yet there is a Gallery between them, where Guards are kept during the hours of bathing, so that the men do wait upon the Ladies so far only as this Gallerie; after which they go into their own private Tents, where they are at full liberty: Also the men do never bathe at the same hours they do, for they bathe mornings, and the Ladies evenings: So that after they have waited upon the Ladies to the Gallery, they afterwards walk in the Meadows, and wait until they have done bathing, and then to conduct them unto their coaches which stand in ranks in the Meadow, and this year was a most rare year for abundance of company: Indeed there was Ladies from all parts of Greece; some from Athens, some from Thebes, others from Magares, Argos, Corinth, Chalcis, Delphos, and a hundred other places; and I do verily believe, except from Lacedemon, there was company from all the principal Towns in Greece. Moreover, there was Musicians from all places in the world which had any fame for excellency: Indeed there was no pleasure, but it was there to be found, and more pure then in any other place, for there was not a man who had the face of business or domestique occasions upon him, all their care was only to divert, But Madam, be pleased to know, that the hours of the womens bathing being an hour before Sunset, as the mens was an hour after the rising, Pisistrates and I came to Hermopiles when the Ladies were in their Tents: So that Pisistrates having been there formerly, he knew the custome of the place, and we alighted from our horses at the side of the Meadow, then went to walk as the rest did; for since we had not come far, we were in equipage well enough to appear before the Ladies: Also Pisistrates (who as good luck was) was not in one of his negligent humours, he had on a Country habit, the most magnificent and gallant that possibly could be seen: But we had no sooner walk'd twenty paces in the Meadow, but an Athenian man of quality called Ariston, named us unto the company with whom he was, and came to meet us with them; and it being the custom of the place for those who came first to do honors unto such as come after, they received us very civilly. For my part, being altogether a stranger, I viewed these several Tents with much delight, and informed my self from Ariston of all I desired to know.

But after the first civilities were over, Pisistrates and I being parted from the rest with Ariston, we asked him if there were any beauties of Fame there that year? And after he had told us, that there was many who were very fair, others less fair, others less then they, and others not fair at all: I spied among the Tents of the Ladies, one walking alone very reservedly, whose garb was extremely noble, and habit very gallant: Indeed Madam I forgot to tell you, that they use to dress themselves after a very particular manner in that place, which truly is very pleasing and delightful; for the habit of the <◇> is resemblant unto that which Painters dress the Nymphes of Diana in; and the r <...> the custome is, that since they must undress themselves to bathe, such a dress was in <...> as was both gallant and convenient for that purpose.

But to return from whence I digressed, I told you that I saw one walking alone <...> not seeing her face, I asked Ariston who she was? Though you know her no <...> r walk (said he unto me) yet she is one of our Athenian beauties. At these words <...> Pisistrates looking more attentively upon her, and she turning her face towards us, <...> whether to be Cleorante, of whom I spoke in the beginning of my discourse, and <◇> was Daughter unto Megacles, a principal Athenian. He no sooner knew her, but <...> ed her, though he had never spoke unto her; for since there had been an opposite faction between their Fathers, there was no familiarity between their Families: Yet <◇> Athens was then all in tranquillity, Pisistrates and Megacles were upon civil terms, though they used not to visit each other: But Megacles not being at the bathe, only his Wife call'd Erophile, this did facilitate the acquaintance of Pisistrates and Cleorante. In the mean time, since this fair one returned her salute so civilly, she obliged Pisistrates to talk longer of her, and to ask Ariston how long she had been at the bathes: So little a while, replied Page 147 he, that if you had been seen privately at Athens with her, I should have thought you had held intelligence together, for Erophile and she have been here only two daies. But how comes it to pass (said I unto Ariston) that Cleorante does not bathe? For I finde her fair enough to preserve her beauty: The reason is (replied he) because she is so fair, as she think should wrong her self should she use a thing which has a reputation of imbellishing it. I thought indeed, said Pisistrates then, that Cleorante was very fair; at least I remember very well, that in the time of our divisions at Athens, I saw her one day in the Church at a nearer distance then now I do, and I said unto one, that I was very sorry Megacles had so fair a Daughter. You speak of this in such a pleasant manner, (replied Ariston) as would move one to say you had no eyes: I assure you (said he unto us) that I have not eyes alwayes for that which I look upon, for if my minde and my eyes do not hold intelligence together, I know not well what I see.

As Pisistrates said so, we saw many Ladies coming out of their Tents after they had bathed themselves, who meeting with Cleorante, began to walk together towards the Gallery; and since we were very near them, we saluted them. But as they turned back stayling for other Ladies to come out from bathing, Ariston at the request of Pisistrates spoke unto her: I beseech you Madam (said he unto Cleorante) do not so soon deprive us of the happiness in seeing you, but give me leave to present two Athenians to you, who are sorry they have need of my mediation to make themselves known unto you, and that they have not hitherto the honor to be acquainted. Ariston being a particular friend unto Cleorante, she stayed, and kept one of her friends with her named Cephise, and coming then out of the Gallerie with as much grace as civility: If these noble Athenians, said she, would know me better then they do, they must disclaim from those civilities you tell me of: It appears very plainly Madam, replied Pisistrates, that I have not the honor to be known unto you, since you think I can disclaim from what Ariston hath said unto you. For my part Madam, added I, I think it is sufficient that the fair Cleorante does know her self, not to doubt, but that as soon as any sees her, they must needs be sorry they saw her no sooner: At least I am sure, said Ariston to her, that Silamis thought you so fair, as he wondred why you should not bathe your self, since the bathes have a reputation of preserving beauty. Since I do know my self very well, replied she and smiled, I have good reason to think that your friend finding so little of beauty as I have in my face, he thinks I should wrong my self if I should hazard the losing of it, in a thought, that if I should lose any, there would not remain so much as would let me be endured: I profess Madam, said the Lady who was with her, you do wrong unto so great a beauty as yours is: I beseech you, said Cleorante and smiled, do not smother me with commendations, for since Pisistrates and Silamis do hardly know me, they will think I love to be commended, hearing one of my friends flatter me so highly; and I pray know that I do not love to be commended to my face, though I must confess I love it well enough in speaking unto others, behinde my back. But I beseech you Madam, replied Pisistrates, what satisfaction will those commendations do you which you hear not, and very often will never know of. As for example, added he, I am confident, that though I should depart to morrow and never see you again as long as I live, yet I should speak above a hundred times of you, and you never know it: Perhaps you Sir would speak so little in my advantage, replied she, and smiled, that it would be better for me not to know what you say of me: I assure you Madam, said I unto her, if you did well know Pisistrates, you would easily believe that he never speaks so oft of one that does not please him; and she would know also, added Pisistrates, that I am alwayes speaking of her who pleaseth me. As Pisistrates said so, Erophile, and almost all the Ladies being come out of their Tents, Cleorante left us, and went unto her mother, who doubtless had been one of greatest beauties in all Athens, and still was very well: Those who had seen her young, yet said, that she was never so lovely as Cleorante, who indeed was one of the most charming Beauties upon earth; for besides that her Beauty was a Beauty of great lustre, she had also such rare ayre of youth, such a pleasing and merry modesty, and such an inviting power, that it was an impossibility to resist her.

But Madam, as soon as she had left us, we went, as all the rest of the men did who walk'd in the Meadow, to wait upon the Ladies at the door of the Gallery, and to present our hands unto them; for in that place men have as much liberty as at a Ball, where it is not necessary to be acquainted before they speak, or dance together. In the mean time, Ariston being next the door, and (as I said before) being a particular friend unto Cleorante, Page 148 when she went out, she tendered her hand unto him; but as soon as he took it, he turned towards Pisistrates, and told him, that as a testimony of his friendship he would surrender his place unto him: And (added he, speaking unto Cleorante) as he deserves it better then I, so I beseech you Madam let him have it: It seems you are weary, replied she and laughed, and desiring Pisistrates should be so also, you would have him go away to morrow: No Madam, answered Pisistrates, but on the contrary Ariston desires my stay here, and therefore he lets me have the honor of speaking to you: However it be (said Ariston in leaving them) I hope you will tell me what you talk of at the end of the walk. After this, Ariston presented his hand unto another Lady, and I mine unto Cleorantes friend, of whom I spoke: So that the evening being very fair, they walked a long time: Pisistrates and Cleorante had so much leisure as to talk enough to let one another know, that they had both of them most admirable wits. But the hour of returning unto Alpenes being come, Ariston came to them, because the Lady whom he waited upon went first alway, and as soon as he had put her in the Coach, he came and asked Cleorante and Pisistrates how they liked one another: For my part, said Pisistrates and laughed, I must tell you, that I was never in all my life so taken with any, as I am with Cleorante, and me-thinks I have been acquainted with her ever since she began first to live: For my part, said this fair one, Pisistrates is so little a stranger unto me, that I believe if I had any secrets, I durst trust them unto him. To testifie unto you (added Pisistrates) that we were not at any non-plus, as ordinarily those are who are first acquainted: I assure you we talked all the while, and yet not of any beauties of the time, or that of the place, nor of any such kinde of things as people use to talk of when they have nothing else to say. As Pisisrates said so, Erophile being returned to call her Daughter, Ariston advanced towards her, and told her at the desire of his friend, that Pisisrates had a design to go with her to her house: So that she staying, he saluted her, and she received him very well; for she being a Lover of peace, quietness, and pleasures, she was very desirous to contract an amity between Megacles and Pisisrates; yet this conversation was not long: For since it was very late we only waited upon the Ladies to their coach: After which, Pisisrates, Ariston, and I, we walked a little longer.

In the mean time, they had no sooner left us, but I said unto Pisisrates in a laughing manner, that I found he would ere long be accustomed unto Cleorante: But be sure, said I unto him, whilst Ariston was taking order for our lodging, that first you have unaccustomed your self from Cerinthe, and from Euridamia: We shall stay so little here, replied he and laughed, that I shall not have leisure to accustom my self in earnest with Cleorante: And we shall return so soon unto Athens, that I shall not have leisure to unaccustom my self from Cerinthe and Euridamia: But Euridamia and Cerinthe, said I unto him, will not be there when you return, for they are both in the Country: 'Tis very true, said he unto me, I profess I had forgotten that: Really, said I unto him and laughed, this is a most infallible proof that you are not in love with them: For it is without example, either in a Lover or a friend, that they should forget they bad adieu unto their Mistress or friend, and not remember whether they be absent or present: Since I laughed something loud, Ariston coming towards us, asked what I laughed at? But Pisisrates not well knowing any reason why, forbade me to tell him so earnestly, that indeed I did not: After which, we began again to talk of Cleorante, and we asked him, whether she had as much goodness as she had beauty: Doubtless she hath (replied Ariston) but she hath one good quality which is very particular, for she is unequal humoured, without any fantasticalness, and she is at that very same time one of the most equal humoured persons upon earth, in many things. This is a thing, replied I, which cannot be easily comprehended: Yet it is most true, replied he, for most certain it is, that Cleorante is always one of the best persons in the world, and loves her friends with the most even, constant, and equality of humour. In what then is she unequally humoured? replied Pisisrates. In this, answered he, that she is sometimes merry, and sometimes serious, and yet her jocundry never makes her too merry, nor her seriousness too melancholy, but for all that, she is of a very different humour, though she be always equally good. Moreover, the very same pleasures will not equally delight her; for some daies it is a torment unto her to talk of going to a Ball, and sometimes she is wholly intent upon it; and yet, whether she be merry or serious, she is allways equally amiable to all her friends, for she never has any pettish humours towards them, how different soever she be to her self; and indeed it may well be said, that she is only different and unequal, to the end she may the more please, and make it appear she Page 149 has all the charms that can be found in two tempers so opposite to each other: You set Cleorante out by such a Character, as fills me full of curiosity to know her more particularly, replied Pisisrates, and I think that if I had no business at Athens, I should stay here as long as she did; but since I intend my time here to be not above seven or eight daies, I desire to employ that time in seeing her as much as I can: If that be your design, replied Ariston, then we must retire; for it is this very night that all the Ladies met at her mothers house to dance.

Ariston had no sooner said so, but Pisisrates went towards our horses, at the side of the Meadow with Aristons: After which, we went unto Alpenes, and lodged at Aristons house, who gave his own Chamber unto Pisisrates, and divided another between me and himself, for there was this year such a multitude of people at the Bathes, that without him we should have been puzzled for a lodging. In the mean time, Pisisrates having his men and equipage with him, he put himself into a habit for dancing, and did it doubtless without having the least thought of falling in love with Cleorante; on the contrary, when I came unto his Chamber, he talked with me of Cerinthe and Euridamia as we were wont, and he wished them in that place, asking me, which I thought would first return to Athens, adding, that as soon as he returned thither, he intended to write unto them of all the passages at the bathes, and to make an ample relation of them. After which, Ariston also entering, to tell us it was time to go, and acquainting us with the mode of their Gallantry, to the end we might not seem as strangers, we went unto Erophiles house, who with Cleorante, received us with much civility, and Cleorante putting her self into another dress after her return from the bathes, with an addition of Jewels thereunto, she was a fresh lustre of beauty in the eye of Pisisrates. Again, since he was better acquainted with her than any of the rest, and since she was the only Lady of all the company except Cephise, unto whom he ever spoke, therefore he applied himself more assiduously unto her, and took her out to dance after then any other. Both of them chancing that night to be in their frolicke humours, they danced so well together, that all the company admired them: Truth is Madam, it may well be said, they passed away that night together in private amidst a great multitude, so seldom were they separated; for my part, though I applied my self to Court Cephise, yet I observed by the countenance of Pisisrates, that he was not weary of his employment, and by Cleorantes, that he was welcome to her: Also I plainly saw, that all the great Feasts of Athens did never divert Pisisrates so much as this Assembly, and indeed it was such as would delight any, for the Ladies were very fair, they were in more Gallantry of dress then ordinary, and there was a kinde of greater freedom then at those Balls which are kept in Towns. But the hour of retiring being come, and the company parting, we parted as the rest did, and in our return I observed, that Pisisrates was extremely gay and pleasant: So that coming to him, whilst Ariston was talking to some other men: Doubtless, said I unto him, you are extremely well satisfied with your visit of Cleorante, since you are so merry and lively at such a time when every one desires to sleep, and is weary with dancing or waking: Alas Silamis (said he unto me) did you but know my adventure, you would wonder? What in the name of the Gods may it be, said I unto him? It is, said he, that I have found Cerinthe in Cleorante: How Pisisrates, said I unto him, they are nothing alike, for Cleorante is tall and fair, and Cerinthe is little and black: But it must be confessed, said Pisisrates, that the tall and fair is a greater beauty then the little and black, and all the charms of wit and jocundry which are in Cerinthe, are likewise to be found in Cleorante, only here's the difference, Cleorante rallies with less malice, and if I be not much mistaken, she has a soul more tender then Cerinthe: But Sir, said I unto him and laughed, As when we were at Athens, there was nothing but the presence of Euridamia which hindered you from loving Cerinthe, so I shall think that nothing else will hinder you from loving Cleorante, since you finde the charmes of Cerinthe in her: Since we are to tarry here but eight daies, replied he and smiled, I shall not be perfidious either unto Cerinthe or Euridamia, yet since Cleorante makes me remember Cerinthe, I know not whether she will have the advantage of the other. As I was ready to reply, Ariston coming to us, he asked Pisisrates, whether what he had said unto him before they went unto the Ball, did any thing profit him? And whether he observed how closely a man of Cerinthe had Courted a Lady of Argos? and many other such questions: You might do well to ask Silamis whether he saw any such, replied Pisisrates: As for my part, I saw none but Cleorante, who seemed unto me so fair and so lovely, as I understand not why I should not be on the side of Megacles, that I may be a friend unto his Daughter. Page 150 Since it is much a more easie matter to be her Lover then his friend, replied Ariston, perhaps it had been better for you, if you had never seen her, or at least not so soon: No, replied Pisisrates, but on the contrary, for if it be my fate to fall in Love with Cleorante, I would have it at the very first sight of her, for then I shall sooner find a recompence to my million of services, or at least stave off the more Lovers, and hinder Rivals: Yet she hath one very resolute Lover, replied Ariston. I believe, said I, it is the Brother of Theocrite, called Lycurgus. The very same (replied Ariston) and he hath so long loved her without being loved again, that I think he will love her as long as he lives: Provided it be always so, said Pisisrates, he will not much prejudice his Rivals: Yet I assure you, replied I, that a Rival is always a mote in ones eye, though he be hated. As I said so, we came to Aristons lodging; so that it being very late after we had waited upon Pisisrates to his Chamber, we went into ours. In the mean time, Pisisrates being very Noble, and his dancing fancy continuing, he told Ariston at parting, that he desired to give a Ball, and Cephise being Aristons Cozen, he entreated him to oblige her that it might be kept at her house, and Pisisrates resolved to go himself and employ the afternoon following in entreating that favour from her, and in inviting most of the considerable Ladies: But since he would needs begin with Erophile, because of Cleorante, we made not so many visits as we intended, for the visit lasted almost all the day. In the mean time, I observed that Cleorante and he were nothing so frolique as the night before; but on the contrary, she was all serious and grave. The truth is, I never in my life saw a melancholy person so sweet and lovely, nor a modesty more charming then hers: I had need to coin a word to express the air of her aspect rightly when she is not in that frolique humour which sometimes takes her; for the word melancholy is too much, the word serious also gives an Idea of too grave a person; but such a phrase it must be, as will speak Cleorante neither directly serious, nor melancholy; but something that is so languishing, so sweet, and so modest, as infinitely pleaseth, and imprints respect. But Madam, after we had waited upon the Ladies to their Coach, and came to the Meadow, we walked whilst the Ladies bathed. Pisisrates drawing me aside very earnestly: Did I not fear (said he unto me) that you would mock me, I would tell you the strangest passage that ever happened unto any. For truly (said he) yesterday I found Cerinthe in Cleorante, and to day I protest; I found Euridamia, an Euridamia without melancholy, an Euridamia a thousand times more charming then the other: I profess unto you Sir, said I unto him and laughed, this is a great happiness, to find two friends or two Mistresses that are absent in one person, and this one more amiable then they both: It is so, said he, for Cleorante serious is Euridamia, and Cleorante merry is Cerinthe, and this is so true, that if you will observe her, you will finde I am in the right. The thing is so worthy of curiosity, replied I and laughed, that I shall be sure to observe it. But in the mean time, said I, I do not see Sir how you can resist a person who hath the charms of two, the one of which had overcome you, if you had not seen the other: I told you yesterday, replied he, that we shall stay so little here, as I shall not have leisure to tie my self unto Cleorante, or untie my self from Cerinthe, and Euridamia. As I was ready to answer him, we were interrupted by several persons, and all the rest of the day I could talk no more with him; for as soon as the Ladies came out of the Gallery, he presented his hand unto Cleorante, and never left her, until she took Coach. Moreover, as soon as ever we were risen from dinner, we went unto a Ladies house of Argos, with whom the company was to pass away the afternoon, and as soon as we came there, Pisisrates applied himself to Cleorante.

At our going from thence, he assembled all the Musicians in Alpenes to play (as he said) unto all the Ladies; but to tell you truly, we began at Cleorantes, and were so long before her Window, that the Sun was ready to rise before we returned to our lodgings: And I assure you it may well be said, that we rather waked then diverted some of the Ladies. But at last, Pisisrates being every way Noble and magnificent, his design of the Ball was executed, he went to prepare Cephise, who undertook to invite the Ladies, and to the harmony he added a most rare banquet; and he did so often engage himself in such Feasts whilst he was at Alpenes, as I saw it would be longer then eight daies before we should depart; and indeed Madam I was not mistaken, for in lieu of eight daies, we stayed there two entire months. However, that eight day being come, I saw that in lieu of dreaming upon my departure, Pisisrates taking order for a great Feast which he intended to make: So that not being able to forbear chiding him: I see, said I unto him, there is no sign of our Page 151 return to Athens; but I pray Sir, Do that which you said you would: Then put me in memory of it, replied he, for I must confess I have forgotten what it was I said unto you. How? said I, Do you not remember how you said you would write unto Cerinthe and Euridamia? And make them ample relations of all your diversions at the Bathes, and of all you saw there? When I had that design, replied he and laughed, I knew not that I should find Cerinthe and Euridamia at Alpenes; and truly Silamis, to speak more seriously & sincerely both, I cannot tell whether I should much please them in relating all passages here, especially the passages in my heart: For truly Silamis, I never saw my self so neer not being my self as now. To speak the truth, replied I, it would be strange news to send them, that you are in love with Cleorante; for I am sure both of them had hopes of captivating you themselves. However, said he, whether I fall in love with Cleorante or no, I do think it very expedient that you do write unto them a true relation of all the passages at the baths, and that you send them word (as great news) how you believe I am in love with Cleorante; for if I do fall in love with her, the thing will not surprize them when we return to Athens, and if I do not fall in love with her, we can turn it into Rallery. I would with all my heart, said I unto him: But why should I write unto those two Ladies unless you write also? Then do not write, said he, for I cannot write any thing to them at this present, not but that I do very much esteem them; but Cleorante is so much in my fancy, that I can think upon nothing else. And the truth is Madam, he had so accustomed himself to see Cleorante, that he could not endure to be from her; yet he did not plainly tell her that he loved her, but all his actions spoke it for him, and there was not one at the bathes which did not see and speak of it. On the other side, Cleorante did very much esteem Pisisrates; and it was apparent no man did please her so well as he did. The truth is, his whole care was to divert her, and it was he alone who made all the diversions since he came to the bathes. Since there was that year many more women then men, I understood by Cephise, that when we came, the Ladies intended to be at the charges of the Musique and all the diversions, because there was some men who sought for some poor pretences, to be excused from it; but after Pisistrates came, none ever meddled with it but himself. In the mean while, since the inequality of humours in Cleorante and Pisistrates did not every day hit alike, there happened the pretiest disputes in the world between them: But when they jumped both in one humour, it was the rarest sight imaginable to see them together. For my part (said I one day unto Pisistrates and laughed) I should think it much better to have a serious friend and merry friend several, then to have them both in one person, for when Cleorante is in her languishing humour, and you not, then cannot you tell where to be merry, whereas if they were separate, you might be either merry or melancholy according to your own humour: You do so much divert your self at my follies, said he to me, that I should do you a very bad office if I should see Cleorante no more, and therefore me-thinks you should be glad I love her.

Pistrates spoke this in such an angry ay, that I plainly perceived the merry humour was not upon him that day, and I saw he was serious, and reserved, and angry, even before Cleorante; and I had the pleasure to see two persons which infinitely esteemed each other in opposite opinions: Truth is, this did not happen very oft; but when Pisistrates had a fancy of Poetry, and Cleorante a fancy of Musique, they would compose most rare Elogies and Satyres of those two arts; and so of all the rest, as occasions were offered: But one day, policy and publique Affairs was their contest; for as we heard that morning there had been some stirs in Athens, since our departure, Pisistrates being then in his lumpish humour, and fancy of regulating the Commonwealth, he bolted out a hundred quibbles against such as had the Authority in our City: So that Cleorante being in her merry fit, and unwilling to spend all the day upon matters of policy, she began to contradict him; and the rather, because Erophile being busie in her Closet writing unto Melgacles, there was none but Cephise, Pistrates, and me with her. So that after she had suffered Pisistrates to inveigh against the disorders of the Commonwealth near half an hour, she abruptly interrupted him: Is it possible Pisistrates, said she unto him, you should not consider that ever since any force or Laws were, and since they made difference of men, there has ever been some who have ill commanded, and some who were ill obeyed? And therefore time is but ill spent in continual complaints, which will do no good: Why? said he, Will you not give me leave to complain that so many things should be done against all reason? And to see, that the Ath-nians who thought themselves free because they had no King, should now be Slaves unto a hundred Tyrants who have all the Authority in Page 152 their hands? And who do nothing but enrich themselves, and impoverish others? Is it possible one should endure, and say nothing, a thousand injustices every day? And that Athens which is the most famous City of all Greece should be ready to perish, because the Governours do govern it ill: I assure you (said she unto him) rather then torment my self as you do, I would do any thing else; for if you can govern it better, do, and you would do well: But since it is not the pleasure of fortune to cast the conduct of Affairs upon you, believe me Pisistrates it is better to let them alone: And be confident, that as what others do doth not please you, so what you would do would not please others, if you were in their places. If it did not please them, yet it ought to do (replied he) for I am sure that I would do nothing but what was just. Though you did nothing but what was just (replied Cleorant?) yet they would complain of you; for indeed whether Kingdom or Commonwealth, complaints will be; and therefore since (to speak generally) these kind of complaints do better become the heard of people, then men of Quality: I would complain as little as I could I assure you (replied Cephise) Pisistrates is not the only man of his quality who complains, but there are many others. Were he the only man replied Cleorante, I should not find fault with his complaints; for being my friend I should impose silence upon him, or else desire him not to see me till his politique humour were over: But all men of his Volley have of late got such a custom of eternal talking concerning the Publike good, and matters of State, as that they are become insupportable. Some of them we see no sooner come from School, but presently they pretend to be Reformers of the Commonwealth.

Some women there are also, who having only as much wit as to dress themselves, will as boldly give their opinions upon the most difficult businesses of State, as if they had the wisdom and experience of Solon. In the mean time, it would be nothing so absurd to see the Seven Sages of Greece busie themselves in the choice of Ribons or Fashions, as to see these young people of both Sexes meddle with matters of Government: Truth is (said Cephise, and laughed as well as Pisistrates and I) Policy is so unfit a subject for a whole afternoons discourse amongst Ladies, as I will not meddle with it: For my part, (added I, to carry favour with the Ladies) I will never talk of it with women unless I be forced. And for my part (said Pisistrates crabbedly) I will talk of it as often as the mind takes me, for I am a declared Enemy against all manner of injustice, and most zealous for the publique good. But I pray Sir, replied Cleorante, What good will these complaints do you, or any else, be they never so just? For when you have spent a whole day in talking, all your talk does nothing. Also you often reason upon false grounds, added she, because you know the things, and do not know the motives: you propose a hundred expedients which can never be followed; and therefore time is ill spent in talking of evils which cannot be remedied by talking; and though it were possible to find remedies by changing the Government, yet I have heard many able men say it were better to live in a disordered Government, then to alter it: And therefore Pisistrates, the best course is to pray unto the Gods, that they would be pleased to place able men at the Stern of Affairs, but if it shall not be their pleasure to send such, let us see their faults, but not do them, and not spend our whole lives in talking of policy, and making needless complaints; Unless, added she and laughed, you have some secret design which you will not impart unto us, and unless by vilifying the Government you would incite the people to Rebellion, and make your self the Tyrant of Athens. Since I cannot be so, but I must be yours also Madam, replied he sharply, I have almost a mind to endeavour it: For to have such a Subject as you, I would not think the name of Tyrant odious: But I see Madam, said he, you are not so zealous for the liberty of your Country, but that you would hate me if I should set it free. Truly, said she and laughed, provided that in four and twenty hours space you could make a calm in Athens, that there should be neither Civil nor Forraign War, and that you would make a Law forbidding talking against State matters, especially young Gallants and Ladies, I should not much care if you had the Government, because I am perswaded that there is much more safety and less faction in a Monarchical estate, then in a Common-wealth. But since this will never come to pass, and since you cannot reign without abundance of trouble and division, keep your self contented, I conjure you, and let us rather talk of dancing, musique, Poetry, Painting, or any thing, then of policy. Since you will not talk of what I would have you, replied Pisistrates, I will not talk of what you desire, but I will ask you which you would rather chuse, I should be the Tyrant of Athens, or yours, as your Lover, or as your Husband? Cleorante is so generous, replied Cephise, that Page 153 I can guess what she will answer: For my part, replied I, I cannot so easily guess: And yet you easily may (replied Cleorante) for you may imagine I had rather all the Athe-nians were Subjects unto Pisistrates, then that I were his Slave? But Cleorante, said Cephise to her; Where is your love to your Country? But Cephise, replied Cleorante, Where is the love unto my self? No, no, added she, let us not deceive our selves, our particular interest is dearer to us then the general; and all those Zelots for their Coun|try aim most at their own good: Therefore I declare unto you, that I had rather a thousand times Pisistrates were the Tyrant of Athens, then mine. I am so far from being so, replied he, and looked upon her with abundance of Love, as I think nothing more impossible: If you take not good heed Madam, said Cephise and smiled, as she turned towards Cleorante, In your forbidding Pisistrates to talk of policy, you will perhaps oblige him to talk of love. Though I do not much love any should speak unto me of it, replied Cleorante and laughed, yet so one talk gallantly of that Subject, I had rather be obliged to hear it, then to hear talk of State matters, especially some certain men in the world, for there are some whom it concerns not who governs, because they have no interest, yet do trouble themselves as much, as if they had as much right to pretend unto it, as Pisistrates hath. But Madam, replied he, Is there any who have no interest in the Government? Can servants themselves be happy, when their Masters are not? I know not, said she unto him in the pretiest fret in the world, Whether they can or no; but I am sure there is no great pleasure in seeing you when you have your politique humour in your head: If you will Madam, said he unto her, I will never speak of it again as long as I live. If you can do so, replied she and smiled, you will do me a great pleasure. But Madam, replied he, I will not engage my self but upon this condition, that I may speak whatsoever I please both of you and of my self. Pisistrates had no sooner said so, but Cephise and I condemned her for accepting his offer, yet for a while she did forbid him; for she said, What can he say of me and himself? If he tell me of my faults, he will vex me; and if he commend me, he will not much divert me, for I do not love to be commended to my face. Moreover, if he commend himself, I shall esteem him less, and if he discommend himself, I shall think it a disguised pride. So that not seeing what pleasure I can have in suffering him to speak often both of himself and me, it must be concluded that I do hate policy in accepting his Proposition. Thus Madam this Treaty ended, and Pisistrates engaged himself to talk no more of State matters unto Cleorante, and Cleorante promised Pisistrates to let him say what he pleased both of her and himself, yet not to have this liberty but when he was in his humour of policy: But Madam, since this I assure you, he made use of his priviledg in telling her she was the fairest that ever he saw, and gave her good cause to believe he loved more then ever any did: So that Cleorante having a pretence for letting him speak thus; without taking the thing as serious, she mannaged the matter so handsomly, that when Erophile talked of returning unto Athens, Pisistrates had no more to say unto Cleorante, but that he was in good earnest, when he said he loved her. However, since Pisistrates stayed at the bathes, only because Cleorante was there, he offered himself unto Erophile to be her Guard, so that we returned with her. Cephise and Ariston also returned with us. But Madam, be pleased to know, that an accident happened which strangely perplexed Pisistrates; for it chanced unhappily, that when we were near Athens we lost our way, and to compleat the disaster, night being upon us, Erophiles Coach broke, and broke just before the Gate of a base Court which seemed to belong unto a house of good capacity: So that since we had no course but to desire the assistance of the Master of the house, we lighted from our horses, and the Ladies came out of the Coach, and began to walk, whilst Pisistrates went and desired a lodging for all this good company in the great house. So that going yn foot to the Gate of this base Court, to know whose the house was he knockt, and the Gates were opened. And they were no sooner open, but within four paces of him, he saw Philombrotus his Wife, Cerinthe, Euridamia, and Lycurgus, who came out to see them; & having a design to walk into the fields, took that way where the Coach was broken. You may imagine Madam, how Pisistrates was surprized at this sight; yet since he was so near Philombrotus, that he had no leisure to consider; and seeing Page 154 there was no altering his design, he went on very confidently, and saluted him and all the Ladies. After which, acquainting him with the accident which had befallen Erophilles Coach, Philombrotus prevented him in the request he intended to make, and offered very nobly to lodge all that good company, toward• whom he was walking with his. So that these two companies meeting, you may conceive Madam in what a vexed condition Pisistrates was; for besides his loving Cleorante incomparably better then ever he loved either Cerinthe or Euridamia, the sight of Lycurgus displeased him, because he understood by Ariston that he was deep in love with Cleorante; also he had an observant eye over this interview: Truth is, he had so much satisfaction as to see, that Cleorante received his Rival very coldly. In the mean time, since Cerinthe• and Euridamia had no relations to the bathes which had acquainted them with Cleor• Conquest, they both of them looked upon Pisistrates as their own; So that they were both of them in their wayes •gely civil unto him. Pisistrates on his side was the same, but he knew then very well <...> that these two Ladies whom heretofore he thought to have fall <...> in love withal, should now never be but in the degree of friends; and he perceived also by the thoughts he had of Lycurgus, that he needed not to ask him of what nature the affection was which he had unto Cleorante, since he needed not to question but it was Love. In the mean time, Cerinthe and Euridamia finding Cleorante admirably fair that day, because they knew not that she had taken Pisistrates from them, they could not •use but commend her, whilst Philombrotus and his Wife were talking unto Erophile. Truly Madam, said Cerinthe unto Cleorante, I do find you are so much embellished, that you per|swade me the bathes have indeed that virtue which is attributed unto them. No, no, Madam, said Pisistrates boldly and interrupted her, Never ascribe more unto the Baths then what's their due, for Cleorante returns and never bathed, and that freshness which you see upon her cheek, is only an effect of her youth and her own beauty; and I do protest, that out of a multitude of high beauties which bathed every day, there was not one whose lustre she did not dim: Since you went not to bathe your self, replied Cerinthe, and blusht for anger at the commendations which he gave Cleorante, it is to be thought Madam you went thither only to perplex the hearts of all those who saw you there. But you see Madam (replied she, and pointed at Pistrates, Ariston, and me, that I have spared those of my own Country; for they are too merry to have their hearts wounded: Those wounds are so sweet, replied I, seeing the non-plus of Pisistrates, that one may be glad to have them, and that joy which appears in the faces of Pisistrates, Ariston, and me, is a convincing proof that you have not very much wounded us: On the contrary, replied Euridamia, and looked upon Pisistrates, I think it so glorious to be wounded by so fair a hand, that it would be a difficult thing not to be joyed at it. However it be (said Cephise, not knowing the interest which Cerinthe and Euridamia had in Pisistrates) I assure you there was not so many men this year un|to whom the Bathes have done good unto, as there are whom the eyes of Cleorante hath done hurt unto: For my part, said Cerinthe in way of Rally, to try whether her suspicion were rightly grounded, I care not what hurt they have done unto the men of Thebes, Delphos, Argos, or Megares, so the Athenians be free; but for them, I must confess, I would not have her bring them back Slaves. Pisistrates, Ariston, and Silamu do agree so well together, replied Euridamia, that there is no likelihood of their being Rivals: For my particular, said Ariston, I do declare openly that I dare not be in love with Cleorante, and am but only her friend: For my part, said Pisistrates, I will not so directly tell what I am, for methinks it is not handsom to tell before all the world, whether one be in love or no.

This answer which Pisistrates made was not interpreted after the same manner, for Cerinthe flattering her self, did alter her opinion, and thought that Pisistrates said only so, because he thought it not civil to tell a fair Lady to her face, that he was not in love with her. Euridamia for her part, she seeing no share she had in the answer of Pisistrates, knew not whether the hidden sense of his words related unto Cleorante or Cerinthe: But as for Lycurgus, the looks of Cleorante did clearly evidence unto him the obscurity of Pisistrates his discourse; for this fair one turning her eyes accidentally towards Pisistrates, Lycurgus saw she took them off again in such a manner, as made him Page 155 judge, she knew Pisistrates loved her more than he would tell: So that the very same words which extinguished jealousy in the heart of Cerinthe, did kindle it in Lycurgus: They put Euridamia into doubt, and assured Cleorante of Pisistrates his discretion.

In the mean time, Philobrotus and his Wife who were talking with Erophile, beginning to walk towards their house, and commanding some of their Servants to get the broken Coach mended, Cephise, Cleorante, Euridamia, Cerinthe, Pisistrates, Lycurgus, Ariston, and I, did follow them, and chance did so favourably order the business for Pisistrates, that without any exceptions; he helped Cleorante to walk, for it was the custom of the Country, for the strangers always go first: So Lycurgus led Cephise, Ariston, Euridamia, and I Cerinthe. Truth is, she spoke not much unto me, for she had always something to say unto Pisistrates, or unto Cleorante: Euridamia for her part, she entertained Silamis no better, and Lycurgus did not much divert Cephise. Truth is Madam, as things stood, if we had stayed longer, we should have been all weary: For though Pisistrates was not where he would be, since he was not at freedom, he thought himself nothing happy; and the presence of his Rival, and those two friends who pretended to be his Mistresses, did damp all his pleasures.

But being come into the house of Philobrotus, they carried Erophile, Cephise, and Cleorante into a very fair Chamber where they left them for a time at liberty to rest themselves. So that by this means Pisistrates was engaged to be with Cerinthe and Euridamia, without Cleorante: Yet he carried himself well enough in this discourse, for since he always esteemed them, and saw them both together, he spoke nothing which might make them think he was changed; and if they had seen him only out of Cleorantes company, they would have believed him to be the same he was when he went from Athens. But they continued not long in these thoughts, after Erophile, Cephise, and Cleorante came out of their Chambers, and went into a Parler which looked into a lovely Garden where Cerinthe, Euridamia, and all the rest of the company were: For as soon as Cleorante appeared, Pisistrates went to her, and had so quite forgotten that Cerinthe and Euridamia observed him, as though she had not been above half an hour out of his sight, yet he seemed as glad to see her again, as if he had been months from her: So that now the melancholy and merry Ladies began both to think one and the same thing, and concluded certainly that Pisistrates was in love with Cleorante, for Cerinthe was vexed, and Euridamia was sad, yet both of them had one equal consolation in the adventure, for Cerinthe had rather lose Pisistrates by Cleorante than by Euridamia, and Euridamia had rather Cleorante should get Pisistrates from her, then Cerinthe should: Yet this poor consolation did not so much cheer them up, but that it might be easily observed there was something in their minds which did not please them, for Cerinthes Rallies were a little too tart, and Euridamia's melancholy would not give her leave to speak: So that Cleorante having a discerning wit, she quickly perceived that these two Ladies pretended something to the heart of Pisistrates; and being full of curiosity to know the certainty, also knowing I was intimate with Pisistrates, she laid her plot after Supper, that she engaged me to talk with her, purposely to pump satisfaction out of me: On the other side, Cerinthe and Euridamia having a burning desire to know all passages at Thermopiles between Pisistrates and Cleorante, they began to communicate their design, and to seek out ways to be informed: So that seeing Cleorante talk with me, Cerinthe fell into discourse with Ariston, intending to squeeze him, whilst Euridamia talked with Cephise with the same design: And since Philobrotus and his Wife talked low with Erophile, Pisistrates and Lycurgus were forced to talk together, though they had no great inclination to it, for Lycurgus knew well enough that Pisistrates was his Rival: And Pisistrates knew from Ariston that Lycurgus was his: So that I do verily believe Madam, never was night passed with less agreeableness, where all the company were rarely accomplished persons: As for Pisistrates and Lycurgus, they were strangely weary of one another: Cleorante was not over well pleased, because I would not impart as much as she desired to know: Page 156 Cerinthe and Euridamia were worse satisfied, because Cephise and Ariston told them particularly many things, which made them think Pisistrates in love with Cleorante: But Madam, the strangest passage was, Ariston had no sooner told Cerinthe that he thought Cleorante had conquered the heart of Pisistrates, but this malicious Lady, who knew not what Cephise had said unto Euridamia, had a strange impatience to let her know what Ariston had told her, purposely to vex her, and to make her believe that she cared not for it; and indeed locking up all her anger in her own heart, and assuming into her eyes her natural blithness, she took Euridamia apart, and told her as very good news, that she knew by Ariston, Pisistrates was in love with Cleorante.

But to drive her malice a little further, she spoke so loud unto Euridamia, that Lycurgus heard her, and if Pisistrates had not been in a deep study, he had heard her also; for I heard her to the place where I was, though it was further off her than he was. In the mean time, Euridamia knowing well the mind of Cerinthe, she returned malice for malice, and did so aggravate unto her what Cephise had said concerning the love of Pisistrates unto Cleorante, that she nettled Cerinthe, more than Cerinthe had her.

Thus these two Rivals in revenging themselves upon one another, were revenged also upon him they had lost; for Lycurgus so well knew that Pisistrates was his Rival, that his heart swell'd with jealousy and hatred. In the mean time, after all these particular conferences, a general conversation began, which was no more pleasing than the rest, for since none spoke what they thought, it was very dull and drooping: Nor did it last long, for as soon as Philobrotus made the motion unto Erophile of retiring betimes, because she said she would be stirring betimes in the morning, none did oppose it, but every one willingly parted except Pisistrates, who could not so willingly part so soon from Cleorante. However, to complete the adventure, the Sun was no sooner risen but Theocrite arrived, with intentions to dine with Philobrotus; but in coming he met his Brother (whom jealousy had waked) walking in the way by which Erophile came the day before: So that lighting from his horse, he asked how Cerinthe did, whom still he loved extremely, though she jeered him as much for his gravity and seriousness, as ever she did. So that Lycurgus having his mind full of his own vexations, and not being ignorant that his Brother had some jealousy of Pisistrates, before he went to the bath, he began to tell him who was in the house. How? cried out Theocrites, extremely vexed to find a man there whom he thought to be his Rival, is Pisistrates here? Yes (replied Lycurgus) he is, but it has pleased Fortune to make him more my Rival than ever he was yours: Then you are fallen in love with Cerinthe since I was here, replied Theocrite with as much wonder as grief: No, no, replied Lycurgus, but Pisistrates is fallen in love with Cleorante, whilst he was at the bath with her, Alas Brother, replied Theocrite, I must needs ask you pardon for not being able to grieve at your misfortune, for I find it so great a happiness to hear that Pisistrates is not my Rival, that I am not able to grieve at anything: For a melancholy man (replied Lycurgus churlishly) you are the most sensible of joy that ever I saw since you can rejoice at my misery: When Pisistrates hath been as long your Rival as he hath been mine, answered Theocrites, you will pardon my joyes to find none. The truth is, perhaps you will not be so miserable as I was, since he may chance find Cleorante, not so kind as he did Cerinthe. Alas Brother, said Lycurgus, there is a great difference between Cerinthe and Cleorante; for the first is capable neither of hatred nor love, and you had no reason to fear that Pisistrates could win any more upon her than any other, further then diverting her, which you could not do, because your humour was opposite unto hers. But as for Cleorante; though she have some suitableness of spirit with Cerinthe, yet she has not such a heart, for I am sure she knows how to love and hate, and I am in danger to be the most miserable man in the world.

As Lycurgus said so, Pisistrates, Ariston, and I, came where they were: So that we were obliged to salute Theocrite, whom we had not seen before. But Madam, Page 157 the wonder was, this grave and melancholy man accosted us with a smile, and I observed it as a thing so extraordinary, as I came to Pisistrates and told him, that certainly Theocrite hath divined that he should not be his Rival. In the mean time, since we knew that Erophiles Coach was mended, and that she would go betimes, we took the way towards the house, where we found all the Ladies together, whom Theocrite saluted with such a kind of air, as was much less grave than was accustomed; yet I think Cerinthe had took no notice of him, had not I told her (as a thing extraordinary) that I had seen him almost laugh: Truly, said she, in the humour I am in, I should be very glad if Theocrite could become as merry as Pisistrates, and Pisistrates as melancholy as Theocrite: Fie Madam, said I unto her and smiled, I beseech you why would you wish Pisistrates to be melancholy? Truly Pisistrates, replied she and laughed also, hath done nothing that concerns me: But I am so much obliged unto Theocrite, that the least I can do for him, is to wish him merry and joyful: Seriously (said I unto her) if you would once make him so by marrying him, I think he would be no longer melancholy: But the worst for him is (replied she) my affection must precede his mirth, and I would have it contrary, and see his good humour precede my affection: But Madam, it was very observable, Theocrites was the least melancholy of all the company, though he was as melancholy a piece as ever lived, for Cerinthe being vexed at the change of Pisistrates, she was not as she used to do: Euridamia her melancholy was double, Cleorante was angry to see that Lycurgus should by his looks and words give out some expressions of jealousy, nor was Pisistrates in any joy, not only because he was a little gravelled between Cerinthe and Euridamia, but also because Lycurgus continued his affection unto Cleorante. As for Cephise, Ariston and my self we were so afraid to disoblige any one by laughing too much at all passages, that to avoid it, we put on faces of gravity and sorrow as much as possibly we could. But at last we parted, yet not without Lycurgus, who faining some earnest business at Athens, returned with us, and was strangely troublesome unto us, though he was a man very well accomplished, yet we were weary of him, because he hindered us from laughing at all our observations. Moreover, Pisistrates and he being never in the same opinion, they were so sharp once in their arguments, as we feared they would have quarrelled. But at last, the Cloud being blown over, we came to Athens, and after we had carried the Ladies to their houses, were all parted. In the mean time, since Euridamia and Cerinthe were long absent, the love of Pisistrates to Cleorante did grow so violent, and he so accustomed himself to see her, to love her and none else, that it had been a very hard matter to have made him change his course of life: But Madam, it was very observable, that Cerinthe being returned to Athens before Euridamia, and hearing that Pisistrates stirred not out of Cleorantes house: That he made her many great Feasts, and that all the world believed him in love with her, she became the most indulgent friend that ever was unto Euridamia: For she writ unto her the next morning, and so continued every Post whilst she stayed in the Country, and certainly she wanted not matter, for not a day passed, but Pisistrates presented Cleorante with some notable diversion or other, or else that he had not some wrangle with Lycurgus: So that Cerinthe thinking (and with reason) that she could not get better information then from a jealous Lover; she treated Theocrites as kindly as she could, purposely to make him her Spy, and tell her all he knew of his Brother, colouring her curiosity with her desire of knowing all Cleorantes ways: So that Theocrite being very glad of such a Commission, did tell her, not only all he knew concerning his Brother, but all that he could imagine expedient to set Pisistrates further from her heart.

Thus by this means Cerinthe did daily make great relations unto Euridamia of all passages between Pisistrates and Cleorante sending her a most exact description of every thing, even to the very least circumstance, purposely to be revenged upon her, since she could not be revenged neither upon Cleorante nor Pisistrates; for considering that had it not been for Euridamia, she had captivated Pisistrates before he went unto the Bathes, she was a most extreme ill wisher unto her, not that Page 158 Cerinthe was of any humour of ever loving much, or grieving much for such a loss; but yet she was so sorry for it, so vexed, and so ashamed, as one may almost say, that without either love or jealousy, she carried her self, as if she had two passions at once in her soul. In the mean time, since the return of Cleorante, Pisistrates, took many occasions to speak of his love, and since he pleased her infinitely better than Lycurgus or any else, she did not treat him unkindly, and though she did not receive his affection so well as he wished, yet it was not out of any aversion, but only out of modesty and prudence; for certainly she did infinitely esteem him. Moreover Madam, you must not imagine Pisistrates one of these eternal sighers, who do nothing but pule and complain, and torment themselves; nor one of those who are continually talking of their love, and nothing else; but on the contrary, he never talked of it long, nor but in two fashions, either in bare Gallantry and mirth, or in making such earnest protestations, expressed in such affirmative terms and passionate, as there was no doubting of what he said, so sincere and vehement was he always in his discourse.

In the mean while, as soon as Euridamia was returned out of the Country, Ceirinte gave her a visit, purposely to see whether the news she sent her had wrought her desired effects upon her cheeks and eyes: Yet she did not receive the pleasure of her hopes; for Cleorante being come thither, she seemed so fair that day, that I do believe both her Rivals would in their hearts confess they ought to yield unto her, and that Pisistrates had a good excuse, though they had some right to accuse him of inconstancy. However, though doubtless they knew that Cleorante was worthy of Pisistrates his love, yet they thought him blameable, though to say truly, he was not; since he never had more than a good inclination to love them, but never had professed any particular affection unto either of them. On the other side, Cleorante discovering at last the thoughts of these two Ladies, she thought her self the more obliged unto Pisistrates, whose love she now received, both out of honor, and out of acknowledgment; yet in her talk to him, she did not acknowledg either that he loved her, or she him; and I do think that since the first time there was ever any Lovers, there was never discourse like that they had one day, and which Pisistrates told unto me the day after.

For Pisistrates being one day after Dinner alone with Cleorante, protesting that he loved her beyond all humane expressions: Truly (said she and interrupted him) I do not think you know well whether you love me or no: For to tell you <...> ully, some daies I think you love me much, and other daies you make me believe you neither do, nor ever did love me: I see Madam (said he unto her) that you speak this only because you take delight to vex me: But Madam, let me tell you, that what you say in Rallery, I can say in seriousness: For truly I must confess (if I may without presumption) that sometimes I think you do esteem me, and I see in your eye a kind of amorous glance which bids me hope: But sometimes again, I think you to be absolutely indifferent; & therefore Madam you would do me the greatest favor in the world, if you would be pleased seriously to discover the secret of your heart unto me, that I may see upon what bottom I stand: Did I certainly know (replied she and smiled) upon what term I am in your heart, I could easily acquaint you upon what terms you are in mine; and to tell you truly, my thoughts do so absolutely depend upon yours, that I do not know whether I have any affection unto you, or only indifference; and therefore I must first know what affection you have unto me, before I truly tell you what affection I have to you. The way to know it Madam, replied he hastily, is to examine all my actions▪ all my words, and even all my looks, and see whether all these do not tell you that I love you: For I do protest Madam, I will not go out of your Chamber until you have positively told me whether you think I love you or no, and told me also, how I am in your opinion. To testify that I will do you Justice (said she and laughed) I will examine all that you have done, and do you examine all that I have done, to the end we may both know what to think of one another: And indeed Madam, they began to speak of themselves, as if they had spoken of some in whom they had no Page 159 interest, and to examine their own thoughts as really, as if they had not known them.

But after Pisistrates had forced Cleorante to confess, that she had cause to think he loved her, yet she would not say she loved him, but said, that though she did think he loved her, yet he loved her only for himself, and that his affection was byassed, and not uninterested. Ah Madam (said he) I am easier to be contented then you are, for I protest I should be so far from taking it ill you should love me for your own sake, that I should think it much more glorious to love me so, then if you loved me for my self only: You are so simple, said she, that I know not why I should answer you: You are so pitiless Madam (replied he) that I can say nothing, but tell you; That if you will not tell me upon what terms I am in your minde, I will do all I can to delude my self, and think that I am not upon such bad terms as I imagined. But Madam, without any further repetition of this conference. In conclusion they agreed not to hate one another, and Cleorante not point blank saying she loved him, yet made such a handsome choice of her terms, that she let him understand she was glad he loved her; yet they had many little jarrings, during which, he would seem, as if he would return unto Cerinthe or Euridamia, but he quickly turned again to Cleorante; and though he gave some minutes of jealousy unto Theocrites, he gave whole moneths unto Lycurgus. In the mean time, Cerinthe having a drafty wit, did so contrive the matter, as she infused some sparks of jealousy into Pisistrates, for she had got Cleorante to a Feast, and spoke not a word unto her; and the Lady who invited her kept the business very secretly. In the mean time, Lycurgus was the man who made the Feast, though Cleorante knew not of it, when she promised to be there, yet Cerinthe had not that full satisfaction which she expected: For Madam, though Pisistrates was for some hours a little jealous, yet out of a kind of pride, he would not seem to be so; for he was perswaded, that whosoever is jealous long, must of necessity have an ill opinion either of themselves, or the person loved. But Madam, the oddest thing in Pisistrates was, I made him confess that his jealousy was daily, and without any new accidents either from his Rival or his Mistress, he was daily and hourly jealous, more or less, according to the ebb <...> low of his humour.

Moreover, the quarrels which Pisistrates sometimes had with Cleorante were so short, that he had no sooner declared War, but he negotiated for peace, and he was so accustomed to love Cleorante, and to see her, that oft-times he would go unto her without any intention, and when he had business in another place: But Madam, to aggravate this accustomancy, as far as imagination can go, I must tell you it is certain, that the lessening of his jealousy was his accustoming himself so much to the sight of his Rival, that he was hardly jealous at all, and that which would have augmented it in another, did lessen it in him. However, though one single passion was not enough to oblige Pisistrates to hate his Rival Lycurgus, with whom Cleorante charged him to live civilly; yet two passions did unite themselves together, to move him unto it; for he understood that Lycurgus did afresh endeavour to stir up the old troubles of Athens, which had put all the Attique Country in division: So that ambition being joynd to his love, Lycurgus became intolerable to him, and to oppose him both in the one and the other, he cajoled and banded with those of his faction, who were no small number: For Madam, be pleased to know, there was alwayes three Factions amongst the Attique people, which were alwayes ready to rebel as soon as they found Commanders to countenance them: Those towards the Sea alwayes made one body by themselves; those of the Plain made another, and those of the Mountains and Tradesmen did alwayes unite themselves as soon as there was any division in Athens. But Madam, that which most perplexed Pisistrates was, that endeavouring to discover how Lycurgus cajoled amongst those of the Plain, he understood also that the Maritime parts were also up, but all his care could not finde out what moved them thereunto. Besides Page 160 this, there was another thing which did much disquiet him: For though he did much endeavour to reconcile himself with Megacles the Father of Cleorante, yet he could not oblige him to renew cordially with him, though he did live civilly enough: So that he knew not how, either to enjoy his Mistress, or to ruine his Rival. But his greatest fear was, lest Megacles should unite himself with Lycurgus, for if he had, then he had been unhappy both in his love, and in his ambition, since his Party would have been thereby more weak, and he should have lost his Mistress. You may imagine Madam, whether that Pisistrates had not business enough. On the other side, Lycurgus being resolved to get Pisistrates banished, purposely to send him further from Cleorante, he did secretly insinuate into the minds of the people, that Pisistrates aspired unto Tyranny; and Theocrites, set on by Cerinthe, did hinder him as much as he could. As for Euridamia, she being more prudent then Cerinthe, she dissembled her thoughts, & cured her self of her weakness by that of her friend. In the mean time I perceived Pisistrates had something in his mind which he would not impart unto me; yet he told me all that related unto Cleorante, but I could not see he had any reason to be unquiet at those passages, but was upon rather better terms with her then ever; yet for all that, he would not discover the bottom of his heart unto me; and though I was the Confident of his love, yet I was not of his ambition; for knowing that I loved the tranquility of my Country very well, he did not think I would approve of his thoughts. Furthermore, since he knew I was ignorant of designs he soresaw, that if once things came to extremity and Arms, then it would be no fit time to marry Cleorante: So that desiring to dispatch that before things were more embroyled, he went unto her and asked her leave, he might employ all the friends he had in Athens, to perswade Megacles unto his Marriage with her: As for Erophile, he was sure she would willingly consent unto it: And to prepare the mind of Cleorante unto his demands, he spoke unto her with as much tenderness as love it self could inspire, and so earnestly, that indeed the heart of Cleorante was moved; and she confessed that his affection had most sensibly obliged her, and would answer him as far as decency and modesty would permit: But when he pressed her to consent he might presently marry her, she changed colour: Alas Pisistrates, said she unto him, What do you ask? I ask Madam, said he unto her, to be happy: Say rather (replied she) you ask not to love me any longer, but voluntarily to lose all the sweets that that my conversation can give you: For truly Pisistrates, Love may go beyond the Grave, but not beyond Marriage; and therefore I am perswaded that whosoever would love alwayes, ought not to marry the person loved; and there is no more reasonable obstacle to hinder the thoughts of Marriage, then to know one loves: Esteem in marriage doubtless is necessary, but there needs no violent passion: Love may grow between people who marry, and may last after their marriage, but it cannot long subsist, when as it is Love before Marriage; experience hath shewed it a thousand and a thousand times, that fruition glutts; and therefore Pisistrates since you love me, and since I should be glad you should alwayes do so, talk no more of marriage, at least stay until my Father will force me to marry another; for in that case, come what misery will, I had rather hazard the seeing your love die, then to live with any other then you: Your language Madam, replied Pisistrates, hath something in it, both so sweet and so sharp, that I know not whether I should commend your goodness, or complain against your rigour: Truly, said she, you have no cause to complain, since I do not entertain one disadvantageous thought of you: But I must confess, I am so fearful to see that change in you, which I see in all Lovers once married, that I cannot fear any thing in the world more, for all men that ever I saw, no sooner become Husbands, but they cease to be Lovers: And I have known some also, who have ceased to be civil unto those who formerly they adored. Page 161 and who care not a straw for their mistresses, as soon as they are their wives. I know Madam said he unto her, that it sometimes happens as you say, but I am sure it will never happen so to me. So every one before they marry, think, replied she; and therefore you can give me no security of your affection. I must confesse, said she unto him, that I am perswaded you will love me as long as we are in the same condition we already are: but I am perswaded also, that you would not love me either more or lesse, if you should marry me: yet I doe not tell you, that I will never marry you, for I have already told you, that rather then marry another, and be obliged to break with you, I would hazard the losing of your affection. Moreover, though I were not in this mind, yet I would not advise you at this time, to make any such proposition to my Father, for he is of late so froward and unquiet, that I think it would be a hard matter to make any Proposition which would please him. Since this last reason Madam, replied Pisistrates, is full of soliditie, I cannot gainsay it; but for the other, I will oppose it with all my strength, and protest unto you with as much sinceritie as love, that whosoever I shall be so happy as to become your Husband, I shall then vow my selfe your eternal Lover. However, Pisistrates for all this, was forced to obey Cleorante, and not speake unto Megacles in a time when he was so melancholly, lest he should receive a perverse answer. But Madam, things being in this condition, Solon returned to Athens, where he was not sorrie to find Pisistrates in love, because he hoped that passion would cloak his ambition. Yet he was extreemly sad, when going to visit Euridamea (who as I told you was his Cozen) he saw Cleorante: For Madam, be pleased to know, Solon found her so prodigiously like a Daughter of his, named Policrite (who married unto a Prince of the Isle of Cyprus, called Philoixe) that her mirrour could not represent a more near & lively resemblance. Now Madam, the cause of his sadnesse was, because on a time when the famous Epimenedes was at Athens, he told him by a Spirit of Divination, that his wife who was then great with Child, should be delivered of a Daughter, and that he should not educate her at Athens, because if she lived there, he would be in danger of so much sorrow, as to see her make the Tyrant of her Countrie fall in love with her. So that Solon seeing Cleorante at Euridamea's, and seeing her great resemblance with Policrite, he was extreemly surprised at the love which Pisistrates bore her; or he conjectured, and with reason, that since he loved Cleorante, he would also have loved Policrite, whom she so perfectly resembled; so that beginning to feare that Pisistrates would make himselfe Master of Athens, he began to have a vigilant eye over his actions. Yet he spoke not then of his feare, nor of the cause: but since that, he expressed himselfe unto many of his intimate friends. However, this famous man commended the beauty of Cleorante very highly: and as some told him, that his Lawes had united the hearts of the Athenians a long time; he turned towards her, They have done you wrong Madam, (said he unto her) for I am perswaded, that to keepe the peace of Athens at this present, is to have all the brave and ambitious Gallants to think of nothing, but how to Conquer your heart, and not to think of sowing seditions amongst the people; therefore (added he, and prepared to goe away) I commit them all into your custody, in hopes to finde them all more amorous then ambitious, and no other disorder in the Towne, but betwene Rivals: And I doe protest unto you (said he, and smiled) that if you doe not inspire them all with the love of their Countrie, I will attribute unto you, all the evils they shall commit; and complaine against you, more then they shall of your severitie. Solon spoke this with such a noble Aire, and so becoming such a man as he was, that none could comprehend that there was a double sence in his words; And Cleorante answered as unto a bare Civillie, protesting unto him, that she had not so much vanitie as to thinke she could doe that which his Laws could not. However Madam, Solon went from her, and went away, in a deep studie, for he had ever found Epimenides so true in all his predictions, as he extreemly feared he would not faile in this. Moreover he was very inquisitive into the actions of Lycurgus, Theocrites, and Pisistrates; and understood how those of the Plaine, those of the Sea-side, and those of the Mountaine, were up in Armes; so that he plainly s^w all humane prudence was most uncertaine; for he now apprehended that the love of Pisistrates, of Lycurgus, and of Theocrites, was the true cause of all the Athenian Divisions, though it did not appeare so in the eyes of the people, and consequently that he was in the wrong, when he rejoiced to heare that Pisistrates was in love, and that he had said, that as long as the Gallants of our Citie were slaves to the beauties, they would never thinke of becoming our Masters. The worst was, his Travels had weakned him, and his age would not let act with the same vigour [Page 162 for the common good, as formerly he had; for he had not strength enough to make speeches in publick, yet he was as industrious as he was able to calm this storm, which threatned the common wealths, and in order to that he spoke unto all the Ring-leaders of the parties, and addressed himselfe first unto Pisistrates, to perswade him unto quiet[n]ess, and not to aspire unto any higher glory, then to be the protectour of the Athenian Liberty. Pisistrates did outwardly receive the admonitions of Solon so well, that any o[th]er but he would have thought he had no hidden ambition in his heart, nor any further design then to oppose Licurgus; yet old birds are not caught with chaffe, nor could Solon be deceived, for he made no question, but either out of the hatred to his Rivall, or love to Cleorante, or else ambition, he aspired to be Master of Athens; so that Solon used all the arguments that eloquence and reason together had most prevalent and perswasive to dissuade Pisistrates from it, who not directly opposing what he said, he assur'd him only in general without any particularizing, that he would never do any thing which would hurt the Athenians, protesting that all his aime was to thwart Licurgus. On the other side, Solon who knew the bottom of the businesse, did speak unto the Rivall of Pisistrates, perswading him to thinke no more upon Cleorante, but to sacrifice that passion for the tranquillitie of his country, aggravating so eagerly the grandure of the crime in those who begin sedition in a state, as it was impossible for any man to say more: For (said he unto him) the fire which you kindle, will not extinguish when you would have it, and the heartburnings which are between Pisistrates and you, passing into the hearts of all those who follow your severall factions, will divide Brothers against Brothers, Fathers against Children, Servants against Masters, and make so great a disorder in Athens, that you cannot chuse but abhor your own actions, when you shall see the sad consequences of them. Moreover do but consider that one of these two must needs follow, you must either prove a slave unto your Rivall, if his party prove stronger then yours, or else you must be the tyrant of Athens, if your partie prove stronger then his: Judge then I pray in the choice of these two, Tyrant or Slave, it be not much better to continue a good honest Citizen. Cleorante (added he) is not the only fair one in all Athens: If you do but well consider all the miseries which fall upon a state divided, you will find the enjoyment of Cleorante (who loves your Rivall better then she does you) will never recompence the vast number of crimes which are committed during the disorders which you have caused. The truth is Madam, Solons arguments so wrought upon Licurgus, as he told him, provided Pisistrates would renounce the possession of Cleorante as well as he, then he would cease being his enemy. But Solon knowing very well that Pisistrates would never be brought to that, he thought upon another expedient, which was to go unto Megacles, and perswade him to make a publick declaration, that he would never give his daughter either unto Pisistrates or Licurgus. But Megacles having some hidden design, received the perswasions of Solon so ill, as it was easie to see he had a share in the divisions of Athens; and indeed he discovered that it was he who was the Patron of the Maritime Rebels, but for all his discovery, things grew higher and higher. In the mean time Pisistrates was extreemly perplexed to find out who it was that made the third party in Athens, for though Solon knew it, yet he told not him, conceiving better to have three revolted factions, then one; and he used all his witts to keep any two of them from joyning, he could not apprehend that Pisistrates and Licurgus would ever comply, because Rivalls will never be of one side, but his fear was that Megacles should fall into one of them, yet after better information of things, that fear was also frivolous, for he understood that though Megacles would, yet the Maritime people would not consent, but forsake him; and the truth was, there was such a feud between the Maritime people, and the plaines, as they would never unite, for being a duller sort of people then the other, and more mutinous; the Maritimes have a fancy, that they are men who hold up the glory of Athens, and are able to do it by force; so that scorning the other, there can never be any good correspondency between them, so that Solon though not able to reunite all the City, yet had this consolation at least, that none of the three factions could correspond and unite with one another. On the other side, Cerinthe still put Theocrite upon Licurgus, purposely to be revenged upon Pisistrates; an I since his gravity did better suit with that imployment then with gallantry, his negotiation with Licurgus better pleased him, then discoursing of his Love. Furthermore, Philombrotus who knew not the secret designes of Pisistrates, and who thought that he stirred only in opposition of those who disturbed the publick peace, he went unto him, and offered himselfe with all his friends, and to acquaint him, that Megacles was Page 163 the chiefe of the Maritime Faction; adding, that he was sure, they were more opposite unto him, then unto Licurgus. You may judge Madam, how Pisistrates was surprised, when he understood by the Father of a Lady whom he loved not, that the Father of her he did love, was the Patron of a Faction opposite unto his: and what a strange Combate there was in his heart, betwix his love and his ambition: At first, he would not believe it, but afterwards Philombrotus did so particularize things upon him upon his owne knowledge, that he did not doubt the truth: He hath told it since, that his first thought was, to sacrifice his ambition unto his love, and to lay aside all faction; but when hee considered that his Rivalls Partie was puissant, and that it was impossible to joyn his faction with that of Megacles, he thought it more expedient, that his ambition should serve his love, and so he would not contend any more with himselfe; yet making it a scruple of generosity, to make use of the Father of Cerinthe and his friends, considering upon what termes he was with his Daughter, he did not accept of that offer which Philombrotus made him, nor did he flatly refuse it, lest he should fall in with one of the either two Factions, and entreated him to give him all intelligence he could. But after he was gone, Pisistrates was extreemly affraid that Cleorante should take it ill, when she knew the truth. However, he would not tell her, that he was of a faction contrary to Megacles, and Lycurgus both: But to take a middle Course, that Cleorante might not be incensed when she knew the passages, he employed one of his Confidants, to propound unto Megacles an union of their two Factions, though he knew it a thing almost impossible to be effected; but he did it only to have some excuse for himself, if Cleorante should offer to accuse him.

And indeeed, this Proposition unto Megacles served onely to make him think that his ambition was the onely meanes to satisfie his love: for Megacles told the man who made the motion, that he had no faction, nor did he thinke Pisistrates had any, but since it seemed he had, he would desire him to come no more at his house, because hee would not have it said, he had any friend who was a troubler of the Common-Wealth. You may easily imagine Madam, how sad Pisistrates was, when he was debarred from seeing Cleorante, especially when meeting him at a friends house the next morning after by chance, she told him that her Father had charged her not to see him, and asked him the reason of it: but after he had acquainted her with the Proposition he had made, and the cruell answer he had received: I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) be not so unjust as Megacles, and doe not hate me. Certainly I shall not hate you, unless you give me cause (replied she) but let me tell you, I shall extreemly complaine against you, if you be an enemy to my Father: I wish to the Gods he would not bandy any faction in A[thens]; but since I cannot hinder him, I must conjure you not to oppose him. I doe not desire you should unite with him; but I desire you to doe any thing that may preserve peace. Alas, Madam, (said he unto her) since Lycurgus strives all he can to embroyle the state, and ruine me, I know not what to say; all I can promise is, onely to oppose my Rivall without any thoughts of hurt unto Megacles: But withall, let me tell you Madam, That if Fortune doe so imbroyle things, that I cannot enjoy you, unless I be the Tyrant of Athens, I shall endeavour it, rather then suffer Lycurgus to enjoy you. Ah Pisistrates, (said she unto him) these are strange expressions: my case is so (replied he) that the most innocent wish I can make is, that I were powerfull enough to be revenged upon Lycurgus, and to force Megacles to let me love you: But as for him, Madam, I beseech you fear nothing, so wil you only leave Lycurgus to my revenge. I cannot allow it, replied she, but content your selfe that I doe not defend him; carry your selfe towards my Father, as you may not drive me to the necessitie of never seeing you againe, and of seem[ing] to hate you, though I doe not; for Pisistrates, deceive not your selfe, but be confident that I will never become yours, without the consent of him who hath most due to dispose of me. Perhaps I have engaged my heart unto you a little too far without his per[mission]; but believe it, I will not make good my faults by seconding them: And though I did love you more then I ought, yet I can take up and doe so no more. Thus Madam, the meeting of Pisistrates and Cleorante passed. Much more had they to say unto one another, but since Cleorante came out without her Mothers knowledge, they parted sooner then they desired, and with much sorrow. On the other side, Cerinthe hearing that Philombrotus offered to comply with the faction of Pisistrates, she was exceedingly grieved; for since she had much contributed by the meanes of Theocrite, to make Lycurgus powerfull, and to animate him against Pisistrates, shee saw shee had transacted against her owne Father, and consequently, wrought her owne ruine. But though to see her Father Page 164 serve Pisistrates, was very much against her minde; yet she knew not whether shee should forbid or command Theocrite to goe on: for to tell him he should continue on as he doth, is to work her Fathers and her own ruine; and to forbid him, was to fortifie the faction of Pisistrates, or at least weaken his enemies; so that she was as much perplexed as Cleorante, who had at least so much satisfaction as to know, that shee had no hand in the disorders which were readie to break out.

Furthermore, Theocrite very desirous to ruine Pisistrates, since thereby he was more in the favour of Cerinthe, and did his Brother service; yet he began to feare, that if Lycurgus ever married Cleorante, Pisistrates would then returne unto Cerinthe, and so from his Brothers Rivall, he would become his. As for Lycurgus, all his plots were how to ruine his Rivall. But whilst the soules of all these were swelled with these tumultuous thoughts, I did sometimes visite Euridamea, who being cured of her weaknesse, did speak of things past unto me with as much sinceritie, as she did of changes present with confidence. At first, she thought that I knew of all the plots of Pisistrates: but afterwards I told her so seriously, that I was onely the confidant of his love, that she believed me, and talked to me afterwards, as unto one who loved the tranquillitie of my Country; so we condoled together the miseries which wee imagined it was like to fall unto. For every one whispered that some sad story was plotting, and which ere long would breake out: and there was then such a strange dismayednesse in the mindes of all those who took none of these three sactions, that they could not endeavour the remedie of those miseries they foresaw. They employed whole dayes in telling one another all were undone, and that Common-Wealth was ready to be ruined, but they went no farther: And whilst all the Factions did cavill with every one of their Parties, all those who were of no faction, lockt themselves up in their owne houses, unless they went sometimes to condole with a friend who was of their opinion. As for my selfe, since I saw Pisistrates was not willing to open his heart unto me, and knowing Ariston was the onely Confidant of his ambition, as I was of his love, I asked him no farther, nor did he impart any farther, not talking any more with me concerning Cleorante, because as the state of things then stood, he could not talk of her, but of other passages also, which he would not have me know, because he knew I was an enemy to all Novelty, and had often heard me say, that I had rather obey a Tyrant who raigned peaceably, then begin a Warre to ruine him. However Pisistrates being a man of huge parts, of all those who stirred in the Common-wealth he seemed least busie, yet acted as high as any other: 'Tis true, the Grandees of each Faction, had their meetings more in the night then the day, so that I can assure you, Pisistrates, Lycurgus, and Megacles, hardly slept all the while.

Things standing on these termes, Pisistrates having resolved upon a conference secretly, with some new seditious persons who were out of the Towne, he intended (after hee had passed away most of the night in going from house to house, to make sure of his Faction) to goe out of Athens in a Coach by break of day, and so he did, without any with him but one servant. But Madam, when he was about fifteen furlongs from the Towne, he was set upon by four men, against whom he did so courageously defend him[se]lf, that they could not kill him, for they espied so many comming towards them afar off, as they durst not stay it, and seeing Pisistrates bleed so exreamly fast, doubtlesse they thought his wounds mortall, though they were not. But a Country fellow who saw the passage some hundred spaces off, did tell me since, that Pisistrates did doe even miracles at that time: But he seeing himselfe all bloody, and perceiving he was not dangerously wounded, he would if he could, draw some advantage from the mis-fortune: so that talking his Coach, he went back to the Towne, in a fit condition to move the people, for he was bloody from top to toe. And he came unto the Towne very luckily, for there was a great number of people gathered together in a great place within Athens which he cros[sed] over, all which were of his faction. So that when Pisistrates had told the people, that that his, and the Common-Wealths Enemies, had brought him unto that condition: there began a great murmuring against Lycurgus and Megacles, amongst the people. Many of the two contrary Factions turned on Pisistrates his side: and the Object was so pittifull, and moved the hearts of the people so much, that in a quarter of an hours space, Pisistrates had abundance of men of all sides, ready to take up Armes in his defence. In the meane time, when he saw the people much moved, he went home to get himselfe dressed, but he was followed with a huge herd of people, who encreased still, every one relating the accident according to his fancie or passion. Some said, Megacles wounded Page 165 him with his own hands, other said it was Licurgus, and others again that it was Theocritus: yet there were some who said that Pisistrates blooded himselfe, only to move the people to compassion; but his own party were so farre from believing this, that they gave no faith to the witty quibble which Solon put upon him when he met him in that pickle, and said that he played the part of Vlysses in Homer but very ill, for you (said he) wound your selfe to delude your own Cittizens, but he wounded himself to deceive his enemies. But Madam, neither Solon nor any else was harkened unto; and this wife Law-maker did strive in vain to lay the storm, yet he did cause an assembly at Pritunea, the place where they used to consult upon publick affairs: there he also consulted to see whether there was any remedy against so great a tumult: as for Licurgus and Megacles, their care was to keep themselves from being surprized, and to purge themselves of an act that was imputed unto them; so that Megacles was at the Pyrean Gate in the head of a great number of his faction, and Licurgus was by the Temple of Minerva with many of his friends. In the mean while the general Councell being assembled, Ariston who was there, speaking very <...>emently against those who would have killed Pisistrates, and rehearsing all the good services he had done for the common-wealth, particularly the taking of Megares and Nysea, he said after all this, that it was but fit that the Common-wealth should allow him a guard for the safetie of his person, which motion being approved of by the major vote, yet Solon did most eagerly oppose it by Orations unto the people with incredible vigour, yet all his opposition was in vain; and the Councell not having the boldnesse of Solon, durst not be against the people, who said Pisistrates should have a guard, and that without any limiting him to any number; and indeed so he had that velry same hour, and Ariston made choise of them. But Madam, you may well imagine in what a condition Cleorante and Corinthe were, during so great a tumult; as for the first of them, she was so much troubled as one possibly could be; for one of her women had told her, that her Father had killed Pisistrates, and that he himself was like to be so by the friends of Pisistrates, and therefore Madam, it may well be conceived how sad a person she was, whose Lover was dead, who though her own Father had killed him, and was also in the same danger himselfe, yet she was quickly better informed concerning Pisistrates; but since she heard he was wounded, and knew not what would become of her Father, she still remained much troubled; yet she could never believe that her Father would ever be a murderer, nor did she much suspect Licurgus: and I am verily perswaded, that this wicked act was done by some resolute men whose zeal to liberty became fury; and Pisistrates himselfe was of that opinion. As for Cerinthe you may also imagine, that she had many disquieted thoughts, for she knew that Philombrotus was gone to Pisistrates, whose partie she was an ill wisher unto, though she would not have Pisistrates perish in it: In the mean time the wounds of Pisistrates being but sleight, though he had lost much blood, he presently appeared in publick, but he appeared with guards, whose number did every day increase, and hearing that Licurgus and Megacles were treating together, and perhaps would unite, and make him lose at once both that sovereign authority unto which he aspired, and Cleorante also, he prevented them, by seizing upon a Castle which commanded all the Town. But Madam, since he thought no lesse of being Cleorantes Master, as Master of Athens; he gave order, that assoon as ever he was in the Castle, some men should go into the house of Megacles, and seize upon his Mistresse with her Mother: but Erophile, and Cleorante being quicker in their courses then the men who had that employment, they were not to be found; for Megacles no sooner heard that Pisistrates had seized upon the Castle, and that all his friends were up in Armes, but he thought of flying, and sent in all hast to his wife and daughter to come unto the Pyrean Port, where then he was, yet she did not obey him; for the tumult was so great in the Town, that her Coach could not passe, and therefore she resolved to take Sanctuary in the Temple of Minerva, where she might be safe, and where she and Cleorante stayed amongst the Nunnes; and indeed there she was received with Cleorante, and she sent to acquaint Megacles with her resolution, so that since he could do no otherwise, he retired. Licurgus for his part, he hearing that his Rivall was Master of Athens, went to the house of Megacles to seize upon Cleorante, but not finding her there, he was grieved to the soule that his Mistresse was in his Rivals power; and Theocritus was no lesse, since he was to be absent from Cerinthe by his going out of Athens: However, both Licurgus and he had no other course to take, but to retire, for the dismay was so great through all the Town, as never was the like known; all the men who were of the opposite [Page 166 parties did flie with equall hast; those of the victorious party seized upon all the publick places, and all the Cittizens who loved peace, did shut themselves up in their own houses, and durst not oppose the losse of their liberty; yet Solon in the heat of this great tumult went into the streets, exhorting the people to take up Armes, and prevent their slavery, and shake off the yoke which would be imposed upon them; he chid them for their base tameness of spirit, and neglected no argument which might move them to oppose Pisistrates, but all was in vain, for the people were more willing to enter into fetters then take up armes for their liberty: So that after this Solon went home, and told all he met, that after all his endeavours he had gotten this satisfaction at the least, that he was the last man that would enter into the Athenian slavery; some of his friends advised him to fly, but he would not, saying, he could never serve his country in flying, but might happily by staying. In the mean time, though Pisistrates might well have rest satisfied with seeing his Rivall fly, and all his enemies out of Athens, yet for two daies he thought himselfe very miserable; for he thought Megacles or Licurgus had carried Cleorante with them: but at last having discovered that she was in the Temple of Minerva, he went to visit her, assoon as he had taken all necessary orders for the securitie of Athens, and to let her see that though he had usurped Sovereign authority, yet he did not intend that his government should be Tyrannicall; and he sent to ask permission to see Erophile and Cleorante, as if he had been only a simple Citizen: also he sent unto Solon, and assured him, that the alteration of Government should not change any of those Laws he had made, but that he would be the first who would observe them. But Sir, Solon answered Pisistrates so generously and sharply both, that one of his friends said he did himselfe wrong in speaking as he did; for truly said his friend, what do you trust in, that you should speak so boldly? In my age (answered he) for I have so short a time to live, that I hazard little in hazarding it; and I should lose much more if I should lose my honour, by flattering my old friend in his humour of Tyranny. In the mean time Pisistrates being then in a condition not to be denied any thing, the Governesse of the Nunnes in the Temple of Minerva consented to his request: 'tis true he saw none but Cleorante, for Erophile was not well. At first Cleorante made some scruple at seeing Pisistrates, but her Mother commanding her, to the end she might speak for her Father, she willingly obeyed. To give you an exact account of all these two said, Madam, is more then I can do, for they said so much, that I believe themselves would have a hard task to remember all; yet I understood that Cleorante received him very faintly, she chid him for his ambition, and said, had he been more in Love, he would have been lesse ambitious. Madam (said he un[to her]) you do not well understand things if you believe all you speak, for truly though I was weary of obeying so many bad commanders, yet I do protest, if Licurgus had not made any attempts, I had rested in quiet: But Madam, when I saw my selfe in a condition to lose you, and to become a slave to my Rivall, it was time to flie unto the last refuge: Moreover Madam, it was not long of me that Megacles stayed not in Athens, for I used all means possible to comply with him, and had I not known that he fell in treaty with Licurgus, and that you were to be the hostage in the hand of my enemy, Athens had yet been in the unhappy condition of being governed by a rude multitude. However it be, said Cleorante, my Father is exiled Athens, he speaks of you as of his enemy, and looks upon you as a man who hath ruined the liberty of his Country; therefore without further examination of the matter, I require three things from you, first, not to attribute what you have done unto that affection you had unto me; the second, to let my Mother and me go out of Athens unto my Father: and the third, to content your selfe with driving out your enemies, and not to take away the liberty of the Athenians. I shall think my self exceedingly miserable to deny you any thing Madam (answered he) but truly so it is, I cannot consent unto any of these, for truly I cannot without a grosse lie say, that it was my ambition more then Love which made me Master of Athens, nor can I permit you to go out, since then you would certainly fall under the power of my Rivall, with whom Megacles hath doubtlesse concluded the treaty which he began, nor can I put my selfe out of that authority which the Gods have put into my hands, since there is my onely hope of moving Megacles, to consent unto my happinesse, in letting you be the partaker of it: So Madam, though I had no ambition, and though I were not perswaded as I am, that the alteration of government is advantageous unto the Athenians, yet my Love only is enough to desire things should be as they are; for to be serious, I had rather be the Tyrant of Athens, then to lose my hopes of enjoying you, or to see you in possession of my Page 165 Rivall. But to testifie, that my love transcends my ambition, since you are so zealous for the Athenian liberty, I am ready to goe out of it, upon condition it may be with you. Yes Madam, after I have made my self master of the most famous City in all Greece: after I have driven out all my Enemies, and put my selfe in a condition to make all the Athenians happy in governing them better then they were before: yet I will forsake all, provided you will follow my fortune, and let us live together in some Asian Kingdome: for I confesse Madam, I have such an aversion against all divided Authority, that I had rather bee the slave of a great King, then to be the greatest Citizen in any Common-wealth: and therefore Madam, it rests onely upon you, what I must resolve upon. The remedy which you propose, replied she, being worse then the Disease I desire to cure, I will not accept of it, for thanks be to God, I have no hand either in my Fathers misery, or in any of your actions: But I should have a great share in them all, if I should follow your fortune, without the consent of those who have a right to dispose of me. In the mean time, I have a great deal of reason to complaine against you, for denying me every thing. Aske me any thing, replied he, which will not hazard the losing you, and if I doe deny it, be it what it will, hold me for the basest of all men living. But Madam, if it doe not conduce to the keeping of you, I cannot hearken unto it. Moreover, I beseech you Madam, let not this title of Tyrant which my Enemies have aspersed upon me, hinder you from thinking me worthy the being your slave, promising you to use all my endeavours to bring Megacles unto Athens: And I will aske no other condition, but his consent into my happinesse. After this, Cleorante used all her arguments to perswade Pisistrates, not onely as the Daughter of Megacles, but as a Citizen of Athens. But the love and ambition of Pisistrates being in that businesse inseparable, she could obtaine no farther of him, but libertie to stay where she was, until Megacles changed his minde. But when Pisistrates afterwards asked leave to see her every day, she denied him, and said, she would not bring her selfe into suspiion of knowing his designes: and indeed she was in so good earnest, that as much a Master of Athens as he was, obey her he must; but yet as it was with an ill will; yet since he feared nothing so much as to displease her, he contented himself with hearing from her every day: And indeed, Pisistrates and Cleorante did carry themselves so prudently in their affections, that the General voyce of all Greece did not attribute any love unto the usurpation of Pisistrates, nor unto the hatred betweene Lycurgus and him. In the meane, this new sovereigne of Athens behaved himselfe with so much moderation, as if he had never desired any sovereigne Authoritie, but onely to make the Lawes of Solon better observed, and to render Justice unto all according to their demerits. Solon also went often to visit this Great Man, and he confessed, that he wanted nothing, but the being borne the Sonne of a King, to have made him one of the greatest Princes in the world. And Solon afterwards said, that if the people of Athens could but forget that they been long without a Master, they might be the happiest people upon earth. Pisistrates so carryed the matter, that Solon after assisted him with his Counsels; and an accident fell out, which made Pisistrates voluntarily submit to be punished for infringing one of his Lawes. In the meane time he remembered the esteeme which he ever had of Cerinthe and Euridamea, and highly favoured of all those of that Family. On the other side, Megacles and Lycurgus united themselves together, and so carryed the matter by bribes, that one night, one of the Gates should be delivered up unto him: After which they surprized the Castle, and forced Pisistrates to goe out of Athens, though he did as much as any brave and valiant man could. Thus the Conquered became Conquerours, and the Conqueror was the most miserable man in the world: 'Tis true, his Rivall was not so happy as he hoped, for as Megacles did intend to call for his Wife and Daughter out of the Temple of Minerva, purposely to marry Cleorante the next day unto Lycurgus, Cleorante with her mothers leave (who hated Lycurgus, and loved Pisistrates) claimed the privilege of the Temple, which is a place inviolable for all those who retire thither. And Cleorante sent her Father word, she was resolved to stay there. Many men thought that Megacles consented to it, and would never have promised his Daughter unto Lycurgus, but because he stood in need of him. But however it was, Lycurgus might complaine as long as he would, and presse Megacles <◇> keep his word, yet Cleorante would stay in the Temple. In the meane time, Theocrite went to Cerinthe, and asked a recompence for having brought her designes so well to passe, but since the disorders of Athens did not please her, she entertained him as coldly as if he had not done what Page 168 she had desired him. On the other side, Megacles and Lycurgus did so ill agree together, and their government was so Tyrannicall, that they horribly hated each other, and so did all the people, insomuch as all the people said aloud, that if they must obey any one, it should be Pisistrates, and repented of the change: Megacles hearing this, and being advertised that Lycurgus intended to take Cleorante out of the Temple, and that he intended to get, Pisistrates banished for ever, and to render the antient liberty to the Athenians, he was almost at his wits end.

On the other side, being retired with a great number of his friends about Athens, he was in a desperate condition: yet he was much comforted by the resolution which Cleorante had taken: but for all that, he was as much perplexed as any ambitious Lover could be when all succeeds ill: For my part, I being sick during the time of these disorders, I was of no side, but rested in quietnesse to see how Fortune would decide so great a difference. In the mean time, not a day passed, but some quarrell, or some disorder or other happened in some quarter of Athens; for besides the inclination of the divided people thereunto, certainly the friends of Pisistrates did much contribute to them: For my part, I understood that Ariston came disguised into Athens, and caused many commotions, in one of which Theocritus was killed; but it was very observable, that Cerinthe was so little grieved at it, that when Euridamea came to comfort her, she cruelly said, that she was glad of it, for she gained more by his death in losing his visits, then she did lose by losing his affection.

But disorders encreased every day Megacles and Lycurgus jarred more and more, and all things were in such a pittiful condition, as every one had great fears that the Town would be Cantoned, and the people fall to kill one another. In the interim, Erophile who wished with all her heart that her daughter were married unto Pisistrates, did not lose the least opportunity to effect it, and perswaded her Husband to comply with him: Megacles halving no other side to take, considering the state of his affairs with Lycurgus, he complied with her desires more easily then she imagined; for Megacles knew, that though he should force his daughter to marry Lycurgus, yet he could never endure he should ever reign in prejudice of himselfe; nor was he ignorant, that being descended from Alemeon whom the Athenians never loved, it would be a hard matter for him to reign, considering the state of things: In the mean time, since he knew how to recant from that extreame aversion which he seemed to have against Pisistrates: some said, that to have a colour for it, he gave out that Minerva had inspired him with such a thought, and in order to that, he hired a huge big woman, who was very fair, to dresse her selfe like unto Minerva, and to fit in a gilded Chair some few furlongs from Athens, that afterwards she should come unto the Walls at Sun-rise, which is the time that most people use to goe and come out of the Town, and the four Trumpets going before her Chariot, she should tell every one that she was Minerva, and that she commanded all the Athenians to receive Pisistrates, and obey him. However it were, or whether this were true or no, yet it is most certain Madam, that a great talk went one morning about the Town, that Minerva had appeared unto many Athenians, and had commanded them to receive Pisistrates, and obey him: Megacles himselfe said she had appeared unto him aswell as unto others. This fancy working upon the spirits of people more then reason could, it united the people of the plain, them of the Mountain, and them of the Maritime places altogether; so that then all the people asked for Pisistrates, and those who some daies before called him Tyrant, and had banished him as such an one, did now look upon him as a Legitimate Prince, ordained by Minerva. In the mean time Megacles sent to treat with Pisistrates, though Lycurgus opposed him, and the very same day that Pisistrates entred into Athens in triumph, his Rivall went out at another Gate, and he was received with so many acclamations of the people, and such joy, as I could not chuse but admire at the lightnesse of men: But to compleat his happinesse, he became both at one time the Lord of Athens, and possessor of Cleorante, whom the next day he married with much satisfaction, and within eight daies he settled Athens in such a quiet condition, as a stranger newly come could never believe it was in such a pittifull condition as it was; nothing was to be seen but feasts and thanksgivings, all the discourse of the Town was upon the generosity, liberality and goodnesse of Pisistrates, for he was an honourer of all the Arts, and of them who practised them: He founded a huge Library at Athens, he gathered together the books of Homer, which time had a little disordered; he Married Cerinthe unto Ariston, who was fallen in love with her, and Euridamea unto a Cosen of Ceriuthe's, so that all the disorders which Page 169 his love and ambition had caused, being appeased, Athens was more quiet then ever and Pisistrates the happiest man in the world: especially in that his greatest Enemies confessed, that he did deserve his happinesse. Silamis having ended his Story, he was highly applauded by all his Hearers: After which, they discoursed upon the inconsistency of things, and the lightnesse of the people, who never speake of their owne minds, which alwaies depends more upon the opinions of others then their owne, or else more upon their giddy fancies, then upon right reason. But since it was late, and since Cyrus intended to take his leave of Araminte before hee returned to the Camp, he left Onesile, and went to the Queene of Pontus, where he found Anacharsis charmed with the soliditie of her wit, to whom Cyrus also bad adieu very quickly, because his love required that he should goe in all hast, to give orders requisite for the March of his Army. Yet he left her not before he had some discourse concerning Spitridates, and concerning Mandana, which so much tooke up his minde, that he never wanted matter to talke of: However, Silamis being brave and gallant, he left Onesile and followed Cyrus, who seemed much obliged unto him, for strengthening his Army with so brave an accomplished man as himselfe.

But this Prince was no sooner come to his Tent, then Hidaspes entered as Gobrias was with him. As soone as Cyrus saw him, he wondered where he had beene, and at his long absence, for said he unto him, I was strangely amazed to see the King of Assyria without you, when after you had delivered him, he came unto me at the Tombe of Abradates, and told me he knew not what was become of you: and therefore you must acquaint me with all passages. Sir, replied Hidaspes, I shall say nothing of what I did with Arsamones, nor of the surprisal of the Castle, where the King of Assyria was kept, for I doe believe you are not ignorant of them. But give me leave to tell you, that after this Prince was delivered, and we going towards Cames where we thought you were, and coming upon the Frontiers of Galatia, we went through a wood before it was day, for the King of Assyrias impatience, caused him to set out above three hours before Aurora appeared: so that wandering in this wood which was very thick, when the Sun rose, I was all alone by my selfe: and I had not gone above a thousand spaces, but I heard a noise on my right hand, immediately after I saw two women, one seeming to be mistresse unto the other, in whose face much feare and griefe appeared: so that going gently towards them, I saluted them as civilly as I could, intending to aske them, whether they stood in any need of my helpe. But sir, this faire lamenting Lady, gave me no time to doe it; for knowing me, she spake first, and asked helpe: as soone as she spake, her voyce made me know her much better then my owne eyes. So that then knowing her to be the faire Arpasia, Daughter to the wise Gobrias, before whom I speak, I lighted hastily from my horse and went to her with all due respects: How (said Gabrias, and could not forbear) did you find my Daughter in the Wood, whom I left in a Castle with an Aunt, who hath lately writ unto me, that Arpasia was with her? Is Arpasia (said Cyrus) that Daughter whom I found with Gobrias, at the beginning of the Assyrian Warre, who I thought to be one of the greatest beauties in the world? Yes, sir, (Replied Hidaspes) the very same you meane, who no sooner saw me light from my horse, but she acquainted me in short, that she had beene carried away by one called Astidamas, who being pursued by his Rivall which had fallen upon him, was forced to leave her under a Tree with her woman. And whilst they fought with extreame animosity, she got into the thick of the wood unseen, and happily she found a Cave into which she entered, and stayed a whole day and a night there, during all which time, she still heard a noise: But never any stirre since the Sun did rise, fearing lest some wild beasts and famine should force them out; they came to the high way side where I was, and covered themselves with leaves, waiting till any came whom they thought would helpe them, and they thanked the Gods for sending me thither.

Is it possible (said Gobrias) that Astidamas should carry away my Daughter, the Son of my Sister in law, he who hath a million of Obligations upon him? and who could never commit such an act, unlesse he were the most ungrateful and basest man in the world? Yes sir, (answered Hidaspes) but he is punished for his crime, by another who is no lesse innocent then himselfe, for he was killed by a man of good ranck, named Licander, with whom he was fighting, when the faire Arpasia got into the wood: yet she was ignorant of his death still after she spake with me, but came to know it presently after; for being in Page 168 <1 page duplicate> Page 169 <1 page duplicate> Page 170 a strange amazement to imagine how I could secure her person, being alone, and having but one horse; as good luck was, as I was talking with her, an empty Coach came by, and talking with the Coachman, I understood that it belonged to a Lady of Quality, who had lent it unto one of her friends, and was returning back, and that this Ladies house was not above fiftene furlongs distant from the place; so that without more adoe, I desired Arpasia to goe into the Coach with her woman, and to entreate a lodging with the Lady who owed it, until some course was resolved upon. Since no better course could be thought upon, she willingly consented, and I promised such recompence to the Coach-man, as he was very glad of the employment: So, the faire Arpasia went into the Coach, and I promised her to dye, rather then she should receive any wrong. But sir, after wee had gone three or foure furlongs, we saw five or six dead men, and amongst them, Astidamas. The faire and sad Arpasia grew pale at the sight, who turning her head aside from this sad spectacle, she told me that her Ravisher was amongst those dead men: since he is dead (said I unto her) you need not feare him: Alas Hidaspes (cried she) though Astidamas be dead, yet all my Enemies are not. And indeed sir, she had no sooner said so, but a very handsome Man, followed by foure others coming out of the thick Wood, no sooner saw her, but coming up to the Coach: Why Madam, said he unto her, doe you shun your deliverer? If you will merit that name sir, (said she unto him) let me passe un|der the conduct of Hidaspes, and follow me no farther; for truly Licander, I would not be under your power. Since I have beene a long time under yours Madam (replied he) you have no reason to feare me, but may well permit me to be your Guard: And indeed Madam, (added he, and looked fiercely upon me) I am resolved that a Persian shall not rob me of that glory, nor will I let the King of Assyrias Conqueror obtaine that honour which you have denyed me, since I have at this present more right unto it then he: since all the King of Assyria's subjects (said I unto him) are onely slaves unto the Prince whom I serve, you have no right unto the Daughter of the valiant Gobrias, who is at this time under his protection: and therefore I must tell you, that I will not leave her, until I have conducted her unto the place where she desires to go.

Since you are single, said he unto me, and I have company, I know not how to answer you; but I am sure you shall not follow me long. If the faire Arpasia doe not forbid me (replied I) I will follow you as long you follow her: At these words Arpasia being so good, as to feare lest he should make use of the Advantage he had of me, and fearing also to fall under his power: she began to use all her Rethorique to perswade him unto her desires, but all in vaine. So that coming to a part of the wood, where were several waies, Licander would needs force the Coachman to drive the way he desired, and not that way which went to his Ladies house. And not being able to suffer the violence which this unjust Lover offered unto the faire Arpasia, though I foresaw my certaine ruine, yet I drew my sword, and went straight to Licander, whom I slightly hurt in the left arme the first thrust I made. Licander standing in a posture of defence, did very gallantly charge his man to stand still, saying he himselfe would conquer me. But sir, he was so ill obeyed, that for all his charge, they fell all upon me at once; yet I was so happy and quick, that in charging through them, I wounded one so dangerously, that he fell amongst our Horses feet: but yet I had three upon me, and Licander seeing one of his fallen, did not charge his men then from falling upon me; all I was able to doe, was to wound another of my Enemies, for whilst I was making at a third, Licander gave me such a blow, that I fell downe as dead: After which, I could onely heare the cries of the faire Arpasia, and could not see any farther of the passages: Yet I understand since, that Licander forced the Coach-man to drive the way he desired. In the meane time, my loss of blood, and my sorrow, was such, that I was not able to relieve Arpasia, that it made me insensible; and I returned not to my selfe, till some shepheards finding me in that pittifull condition, carried me unto that Ladies house, unto whom the Coach belonged. She being a woman of great virtue, she had a great care of me. But my mind running most upon Arpasia, after I had thanked her for her favours, I told her in short all the passages, acquainting her with the quality and merit of Arpasia, and desired her to send some of her servants and relieve her if possible: or if she had not upon a sudden men enough to doe it, yet at least to send one to follow them, and know the place where the Ravisher carried her, confessing ingenuously to you, that I had then no thoughts of the Assyrian King. But sir, This Lady not being able to satisfie my first desire, yet she did the second, and immediately made choice of a witty and bold fellow, whom I informed which way the Coach took, and so away hee Page 171 went with intentions to follow, till he had lodged them in some place where they were likely to stay. After this Sir, I suffered incredible miseries, for my wounds being very great, and being in a place where the Chirurgeons were not very good, I was in a hundred dangers of death; yet I sent unto you Sir, but since you have not received my excuses why I did not follow the King of Assyria, certainly some accidents have befallen the messengers I imployed. But yet (said Cyrus interrupted him) do you know no more concerning Arpasia? And have you no intelligence (added Gobrias) of the place where Licander carried her? yes Sir, replied Hidaspes, for the man whom the Lady sent after them, did play his part so well and cunningly, that he got himselfe some daies into the service of Licander: But to be short, the man returned, and I understand by him, that Licander being heretofore acquainted with the Prince Atergatis in Assyria, had at first a design to chuse the Court of Arsamones for his recreat, because Atergatis was there, but hearing that there were some disorders about the King of Assyria's liberty, he altered his mind, and embarked on the Euxine Sea when the Tempest did cast him upon Colchides, where he stayed, and where he said he would <◇> a long while; also the fair Arpasia falling sick, it was unlikely he could <◇> though he would. So Sir, hearing this, and since I had some hopes of being able ere long to ride on horse-back; also presently after hearing of the Princesse Mandana's carrying away, and of the King of Assyria's death, and also of your march towards the Massagets, I confesse my design was to go towards the place where Arpasia was, to see if I could get her out of Licander's hands, knowing Sir, that to do any service unto those you loved, was to do service unto your selfe: But when I came there, I heard to my sorrow, that Licander resolved to go unto Thomiris, and passe over Araxis and indeed I followed him as farre as I could, unlesse I would be taken by the enemy, and untill I saw there was no hopes of delivering Arpasia, but by delivering the Princesse Mandana; for I understand since, that Licander and Arpasia, are now with Thomiris. I am very glad replied Gobrias; that there is any hopes my daughter may be delivered by the Conqueror of Asia. I assure you answered Cyrus, that I look upon this advantage as one of the sweetest fruits of my Victory if I get it, and next after the liberty of Mandana, Arpasia's shall be my greatest joy. In saying so, Cyrus observed Hidaspes, and remembreing that he had heretofore suspected him of being in Love with that fair one, he thought now that he was not then mistaken, for he thought that it was more then only generositie which made him so zealous; yet he had no leisure to make any reflection thereupon, for having many Emissaries abroad, and spies amongst the enemies, one of them returned and acquainted him, that the Army of Thomiris did daily encrease, that Terez an old experienced Souldier was there, though very lame of his old wounds; that Octomasades was come up with those Troops which the Prince of the Callicipes permit[te]d him to levie in his Country, when his design was to make Ariantes King of the Issedons: and now since Ariantes had made his peace, he brought them for the Service of that Queen: He further told him that Agatheses came to him with a huge aid from Isse[don; that the Scythian Kingdomes had also sent in very gallant Regiments, and that Aripithes came up with an Army the more considerable, because the Sauromites were a warlick people: But the worst of all was, Ariantes was sooner sound of his wounds then was hoped, and in all likelihood, the Fort of Sauromates would be sooner set upon then Cyrus could hinder them; and indeed the very next morning he had certain information that the enemy began the Siege; also he received intelligence at the same time out of the frontiers of Medea, that Ciaxares was dead, though this newes did extremly trouble him, yet he thought it of such importance, as not to divulge it, lest it should damp the conrages of his Souldiers, so that he shut up all his sorrowes in his own breast: In the mean time he took order for every thing, and desired Anacharsis to stay with the Queen of Pontus, and the Princess of Armenia, to the end if he had any need of him, he might send thither to him: But Cyrus knowing very well that bold resolutions ought to be taken up with very few, he conferred only with Mazares, and opening his heart unto him, and told him that though he did not call a Councell of of Warre, yet he was resolved to give Battle; so that Mazares being of his opinion, and desiring no more but to know more certainly the Passes which Cyrus had not viewed, because his meeting with Thomiris hindered him to go farre enough into the Wood: this Prince resolved to march as if the design only were to relieve the Fort of Sauromates, and that in the mean time Mazares should march on with some troops, not only to view the passes, but also relieve the place if he could, and enable Feraulas to hold his enemies in play awhile, and in [Page 172 order to this, the day following, the whole Army of Cyrus began to march, as if only to relieve the Fort of Sauromates, which truly was a difficult businesse, because this Fort, though near a Forrest, yet stood in the midst of a plain, invironed with wood, so rugged and boggy, that it was impossible any waies to avoid these long narrow passes: 'tis true, that side towards Araxes the wood was not above twelve or fourteen furlongs thorough, but after a very narrow and difficult passe, it did incessantly enlarge it selfe, and one might discover the plain, yet this way was very nought, for the plain being all bogges, by reason of abundance of Waters which flow from severall parts, it was impossible to march in ranks, and would be very difficult to passe by files, it is true, in coming near to the Fort, all these difficulties cease, for the place is more sandy and dry, and there was room enough to draw up two great Armies into Battalia. In the mean while Mazares following the resolutions which Cyrus and he had taken, he marched so hastily with his com[mand]ed party, that the Prince Ariantes was but new set down before the Fort of the Sauromats, when he came to the beginning of the Woo. Now did the Prince call into his heart the Love of glory, and the Love of Mandana, and resolved to carry in reliefe to the place, to the end Feraulas might hold his enemies in play, till Cyrus forced them either to fight or retreat; yet sometimes when he thought that the happy successe of the enterprize would reflect more upon his Rivall then himselfe, and that victory would make him the possessor of Mandana, he would give a stop unto his Horse and go softly; but thinking better upon it, and his vertue surmounting his Love, he recollected himselfe, and by extraordinary hast regained the time which that spark of jealousy caused him to lose, and indeed he did that, which almost none other but himself could do, and he was no sooner come unto the entry of the wood, but he drew a hundred and fifty horse out of that little party which he commanded, and appointed them to get into the Fort, and in order to that, he commanded them to go on the back side of the Wood, that they might be unseen, and expressly forbade them to attempt getting in, untill they heard him give a hot alarm to the enemies Camp with all his Troops, and then to take that time to get into the Fort if they could; and indeed Mazares did so happily passe the narrow way which the enemy could not have time yet to guard, that in the midst of the night he fell upon the main guard of the Massagets, and so sharply, that he drive them as farre as their Camp, where the Alarum was so high and generall, that the hundred and fifty horse in ambush, did easily get into the Fort: 'Tis true, there was a small guard of Massagets which did oppose them, but they easily forced through them, and into the place, into the which they entered without the losse of one man. In the mean while, assoon as Ma[za]res understood by the signall, which the Fort of Sauromates made, according to ap[pointment] betwixt them, that the reliefe was entered, he began to think of making his retreat, and the sooner because he knew that all the Cavalry of Thomiris Camp were in armes: Doubtlesse this retreat was very difficult to be made, and certainly had been full of danger, if Mazares had not made extraordinary hast, but in retreating, day beginn[ing] to break, he observed the importance of the passage, and most prudently judged, that upon this difficult passage, did depend the good or bad successe of the Warre. Thus the design of Mazares being happily executed as it was boldly attempted, he went to give Cyrus an accompt, who received him with a thousand Welcomes, commending him as highly for what he had done, as it was possible one Rivall could commend another, as (maugre all his power) Mazares was unto him: But after Mazares had given him an ac[co]unt of his actions, Cyrus acquainted him, how since his departure he understood, that Thomiris had left Mandana in the Tents royall with a very strong guard, that the Prin[cesse] of Bithinia, and the Princesse Istrina had liberty to see her, that Thomiris was come into the Army, that Ariantes commanded under her orders, that the valiant and wise Terez (as ill as he was of his wounds which he received in the Battle which Agatheris heretofore got against Ariantes) was Lieutenant Generall of this Army; that all the flower of bravery amongst all the Massagets and experienced Officers were there, and were hugely numerous: He told him farther, that Ariantes had divided his troops into six quarters round about the Fort of Sauromates, that he had placed his greatest strength on that side toward Araxes, and that he never offered to draw any Lines, or cast up any ditches about the Fort, because he hoped he should carry it in a short time: He told him that Ariantes had placed his courts of guard very judiciously, as he might judge by that which he found at the advenue of the narrow passage towards Araxes; adding that this Prince had so well ordered his Sentinalls and Scouts, that it was impossible to Page 173 enter into the plaine which was compassed about with Wood, but he would be acquaint[ed] with it. But after Cyrus had told Mazares all he knew, he added, that without more adoe, he absolutely must give battel: and indeed, calling a Councel of Warre that very houre, he told all the Officers of his Army what Mazares had done, and what farther he knew, telling them afterwards, that he was absolutely resolved to relieve the Fort of Sauromates: And to that end, he thought it absolutely necessary to advance in all hast unto that Passe, by which they must goe unto their Enemies: for truly said he unto them, if the Massagettes should attempt to defend it, they will be forced to unfurnish their Quarters, and by consequence leave us one passage free to relieve the Fort; and if they doe let us passe without fighting us, wee shall then get into the plaine without any difficulty, and shall be able to give battel upon equall termes and advantages. Also (added he, to bring them to his opinion) though we should not then thinke it convenient to give battel, yet we ought to doe as I say, since thereby we shall be still gaining several Quarters, and fortifying them, and thereby force the Enemy to change theirs, and leave us some passage to relieve the Fort: After this, Cyrus to bring them more easily to his minde, acquainted them with the intelligence he had revealed concerning the death of Ciaxares: adding, that this sad newes was a great reason to induce them unto a quick dispatch of the businesse: for truly (said he with an admirable grace) his death if it bee possibl^e, ought not to be known unto our So^l-liers, but upon the place of Combat, after the victory is gotten; at least I am sure, we must not suffer the Fort of Sauromates be talke[n] in sight of our Army, but rather hazard perishing, then receive such an affront, and retard the liberty of Mandana by being too wise. Cyrus having done speaking, all his Hearers were of his opinion, and Cressus himselfe was of that opinion also, though at the passage over Araxes, he apprehended much danger in hazarding battel: But since hee thought that the Massagettes would be masters of the strait passage, since the Action of Mazares, and would dispute it, he did not oppose the opinion of Cyrus, because hee thought it would never come to a deciding battel, but only some great skirmishes at the entrance into the wood, during which, they might perhaps put some considerable reliefe into the Fort; and so the whole Army not being engaged on this side the difficult pas[sages], Cyrus himselfe would be constrained out of his own prudence to retreat, and not engage his Army to sight in disadvantageous Quarters. So there being no contest, Cyrus resolved that his Army should advance that very houre unto the place which the Inhabitants of the Country call the plaine of Gelons, (because a people of that name were once here[to]fore there beaten) and the day following he marched straight towards the Enemy. But before he departed, he began to give out all requisite orders, to regulate the march of every Regiment, to distribute the several Quarters unto his Officers, to resolve upon the general order of the battel; and exhorted all his men to fight so courageously, that they might come off with Glory, from a businesse of so much danger, that all they had gone through before, were nothing in comparison it, by reason of those difficult passes where the Enemy was to be sought withall: 'Tis true, the joyes which Cyrus saw in all his Troops when he departed from the plaine of Gelons, seemed to presage a victory: for certainly, though all his Souldiers had been assured of victory, they could not have marched with more cheerefulnesse, then they did now in going to share in the dangers unto which the greatest Prince in the world was going to expose himselfe unto. In the mean time, Cyrus was resolved that his Army should fight in two Brigades: that these two Brigades should be seconded with a body of Reserve, which Hidaspes was to Com[mand]; that Aglatidas should be in the Head of the Infantry, that Cressus and the King of Hircania, should command the Left-wing; and Mazares under him, the Right; where the Prince Artamas, Intaphernes, Atergatis, Gobrias, Gadates, Mersiles, Intathyrse, Persodes, and all the rest of the Heroes, who had no employment, should fight neare his person. But Cyrus, who was as great a Capitaine as valiant Souldier, he believed, because in all likelihood he should fight the Massagettes in those difficult passes, therefore it was expedient to line his Cavalrie with some Infantry; and to that end, betweene every squaldron, he placed a hundred Archers, appointing afterwards all the rest of the Archers to be the Guards of Cressus, the King of Hircania's Guards, and his own, also the Assirian Cavalry to be upon both sides of the Right and Left wings. But to the end nothing might clogge him, he sent his Baggage to the side of Araxes, and afterwards marched in the Head of his Army, which seeming to be guided by one soul in every part, came to the entrance of the Wood; and Orders were so wisely given, and exactly executed by all, Page 174 that not one Souldier was to be an inch out of his ranck. Cyrus began now to be in hopes of happy successe, and the Idea of Mandana did so wholly take up his minde, that feares of any approaching dangers had no roome in his thoughts. But whilst this great Prince was advancing with all possible Heroique heat, and employing all his Cares for reliefe of the Fort, Ariantes under the Order of Thomiris, was vigorously endeavouring to take it, before his Rival could arrive: And indeed he followed on so close, and assaulted it so often, that it is to be imagined, that without the reliefe which Mazares had gotten unto it, it could never have held out so long, as to give Cyrus time enough to execute his designs: For it was so ill furnished with all manner of necessaries to sustain a Siege, that it was impossible for the valour of Feraulas to have defended it: Also Ariantes thought it so inconsiderable, that he would never trouble himselfe with making any workes about it, though he had learned very well under Cyrus; how to make formal Sieges. Moreover, since the Massagettes have no Townes, but live all in portable Tents, Thomiris and Ariantes, could not get any information of Cyrus his March, nor of his Number: for all the people about Araxi, fled away as soon as Cyrus passed the River; so as there could not be any certaine intelligence given, nor was the Army of Cyrus thought to be so nume[r]ous as they were: and they were ignorant of his strength, until they heard the Army was entered into the wood; and seemed resolved to passe through those straits, so as they were forced to be tumultuous in their resolutions, and knew not well whether they should defend the those passes, or expect their Enemy in the plaine, and there end the difference by a decisive battel. Ariantes opinion was to give a stop unto Cyrus in these passages, and in order to that, to line the woods with part of their Infantry, and to back them with a good body of Cavalry, for by this course it was impossible that Cyrus should come to execute his designs: also whilst they were thus amusing his Army, they might easily take the Fort with a few Forces, for he had certaine intelligence, it could not hold out above two dayes. The sage and valiant Terez; concurred with the opinion of Ariantes, Agathorses, Octomases, and all the old experienced blades were of the same minde: But Thomiris thinking it better to fight Cyrus in her Country, then to defend these passes; she was not of their opinion, but said the designe was dishonourable, and it was as good as nothing, for her Army to doe nothing but take a poore Fort, since they were in the head of a puissant Army: she said it was much better for them to give battel presently, then to stay till the Massagettes were more informed of their Enemies valour: And that it was more advantageous for them to fight farre off Araxis, and in a plaine in the midst of a Wood where the Enemy was ignorant of the passes, then near the place where they had a boate-bridge over the River. Ariantes yet opposed her as much as ever he could but she without any farther hearing or giving any reason, she told him peremptorily it should be so: and accordingly it was resolved, to let the whole Army of Cyrus pass into the plaine without any stop or opposition. Truth is, though this resolution of Thomiris had not been followed, yet, they had been forced to take it; for whilst the interest of Thomiris and Ariantes moved them to different opinions; and whilst they were debating what to doe, or not doe, the Forlorne hope of Cyrus his Army, appeared close by the Massagettan Campe: so that then Ariantes seeing no way but to assemble all their Quarters, and to thinke of nothing but fighting; and to lose no time, Thomiris and Ariantes sent in post hast to Aripithes to make hast, and joyn with them. But to omit nothing which a great Captaine could doe upon such an important occasion, you must know, that Cyrus, when he departed from the plaine of Gelons, towards the entrance into the wood, he marched in battalia upon two banks, until he came to the entrance of the strait Passes, and to <◇> into nothing rashly, he sent Mazares to view them, and hee made choice of him for that imployment; because he had been already in the woods, when he relieved the Fort: But this generous Rival unto Cyrus, finding these passes defended onely with a Guard of fifty Horse, he easily beat them off, and returned to tell this Prince, that he might easily be master of these passes, provided he made hast. So that now it was apparent there would be a battel, since the Enemy did not guard the Passes, and since Cyrus would engage them beyond the wood. Cressus now was of another opinion, and used all his argument to alter the designe. But Cyrus having told him in few words his reasons why he would fight, commanded him to goe immediately unto those Forces which he was to command. The zeale which Cyrus had to fight, and quickly to deliver Mandana, was so high, that fearing something should be an obstacle unto his resolution of fighting, he would not follow what the dictates of his prudence hinted unto him: but on the Page 175 contrary, out of his excesse of Love, and desire of glory, would needs advance so near the enemy, that it should be impossible to disengage himselfe from a generall combate. Tis true, since Myrsiles, Intaphernes, and Atergatis had their Mistresses with Mandana, they did not contrary a design which would hasten their liberty, nor did Artamas and Indatheres thwart it. Cyrus then having fixed upon this bold and generous resolution, he went with all the Cavalry of his right wing, unto a little hill which was near the enemy, and there he staid: as soon as he was there, he dispatched order upon order to the rest of his troops, to make all possible hast after him. In the mean time, Cyrus knowing the rules of Warre very well, he also knew that his Love of Mandana, and desire of glory having drawn him so near the enemy before his army was joyned, he had extreemly endangered himselfe and all his army; for it is most certain, that if the Massagettes had at that time fallen upon him with all their Cavalry, it had been impossible for him to have withstood their force; but to carry the matter as well as he could, and avoid the danger in which he was with glory, this great soule stood in such a resolute posture, and so handsomely placed those few forces he had, that he wholly covered the top of that hill on which he stood, so that by this means the Massagets could have no knowledge of what forces he had behind, and not imagining that so inconsiderable a party as appeared, should ever advance alone so near them, they conceived that it was seconded with the whole Army, and therefore had no mind to give the assault: yet they did intend to charge through the body, to see what was behind it, and therefore they made severall skirmishes, but all being with bad successe, they gave over and rested, untill they had assembled all their severall quarters into Battallie. Chrisantes who was next Cyrus, wondered at his design, and was in perpetuall fears till the rest of the Forces came up, for he plainly saw, that if Ariantes had known in what condition he was, he would utterly ruined; when he looked towards the enemies Army, he saw them so hugely numerous in comparison of his small party, that it might well be said, Ariantes might have vanquished them with a wish; and when he saw the Forces of Cyrus so farre off, that there was no appearance of them, he was even desperate: But at last, Fortune being resolved that this great Prince should never perish by an act of courage, wherein yet some prudence was, things happened better then his hopes; so that both sides staying till their forces came up, they both drew into Battalia: The forces of Cyrus passed the straits without any disorder, those of Thomiris came up and joyned, and both sides chose their ground with equall advantage: That ground which Cyrus chose to make his Camp of Battle, was large enough to range his whole Army in that order he was resolved they should fight; indeed he had chosen a rising ground which looked over all the plain, especially from the marshy grounds which was upon the left hand unto the entry into the wood, which not being thick in that place, his squadrons might well enough range themselves in it: on the other side, there was another rising ground opposit unto that which Cyrus was possessed of, of an equall height, where the Massagets quartered, so that between these two armies there was such an equall descent, which made a kind of a little plain, as those who were experienced in the art of Warre did know, that the first assaulter was in danger to be overcome: Moreover, before the right wing of the Massagettes, by a little River, was a very high and thick wood, which reached to the bottom of the valley; so as it was to be imagined, that Ariantes to make use of that advantageous situation, would place there some Archers, which would extreemly gall Cyrus when he came to fight. Thus you see what ground Cyrus and Ariantes chose for the two most warlike Armies in the world to fight upon, and where the possession of the rarest Princesses upon earth was to be disputed: In the mean time they had leisure enough to post themselves, and did draw up in great order and quietnesse; for both being resolved to give Battle, they never skirmish, but thought only of the main Battle. Thus these two great Captaines drew up their armies and forces as they came up, as if they had been agreed so to do; yet the truth is, the Artillery of Thomiris her Army, did much more hurt unto the Army of Cyrus, then that of Cyrus did upon hers, because she had many more of them; and indeed the invincible Cyrus could not display the wings of his Army, nor stretch out his Battalions without great danger of the enemies Artillery and engines; yet his high resolution made all his Troops so stout, that Maugre all the mischief of these engines, they stood firm to their stations, though they saw many of themselves kill'd and wounded, amongst which the valiant Araspes received a hurt up his thigh; but after incredible toyle, and indefatigable vigilancy, Cyrus had the satisfaction Page 176 to see that his whole Army had passed the strait passages, that the body of his reserve, after they had got out of the woods, went to possesse the place which he appointed them, and that he had time enough to fight, since the Sun was above two howers high; so that though this valiant Prince knew very well, by reason of the descent into the valley, it was more difficultly to assault, then to be assaulted, yet his impatient zeal of fighting for Mandana's liberty, and his own glory, perswaded him, that it was not advantageous to give his enemies any longer time to make good their ground, but that it was much more glorious to assault then to be assaulted.

So that alwaies using to follow the dictates of his own great heart, when they were not flatly against the rules of prudence, he gave orders to advance and fight; yet for all this and much against his mind, he altered his intention, by reason of such a strange accident as was like to have proved fatally sad unto his whole Army, and cast him into such a danger, as all his valour and prudence could not repair; for the rash headlong valour of the King of Hircania, had like to have caused such a misfortune, as was not possible for him to foresee, for since the left wing of Cyrus his army was towards the boggy grounds, this Prince could not believe but that it was there secure, and that the enemy would make no attempts upon it, so that he himself was alwaies in the right wing, as in the place where he expected most danger: Moreover since he knew himselfe to be the Soul of his army, and would trust none but himselfe with things of highest importance, he was extreemly busie in observing the motions of the Massagettan Army, that he might regulate his designs accordingly: Cressus for his part seeing there was nothing like to be attempted upon the left wing which he was to lead, he came to be with Cyrus, and relied wholly upon the King of Hyrcania: but this King being extreemly vexed that Cressus should be preferred before him, because he thought him to be a vanquished King, he had a great desire to shew some high exploit in his absence; also he bore an ill will unto Mazares, because he thought Cyrus by his means treated Cressus so well, and bearing a huge envy unto him for that noble enterprize of relieving the Fort of the Sauroimates, he resolved to perform some such glorious act, as should transcend all others.

In these thoughts he imagined, that if the left wing which he was to command could crosse over the boggs, he should be able to do great service, by getting behind the Wood; being perswaded that the Massagettan Army being in fear of Cyrus, could not oppose his design: so that being prepossessed by his passions which tyrannized over his heart, he never considered the dangerous consequences of that march, but went towards this marshy ground with all his Cavalry, and a great part of his Infantry, not so much as sending Cyrus any word of it. Thus by this rash attempt, which was against all military orders, he did hazard the glory of the greatest Prince upon earth, and likewise endangered the losse of Mandana's liberty for ever. Cyrus who knew nothing of what the King of Assyria had done, had given the generall order to march toward the enemy, and being alwaies accustomed to be immediately obeyed, all the severall bodies of which his army was compos'd did even begin to move, when he was acquainted with what the King of Hircania had done; however, he no sooner heard it, but without any uselesse complaints which could not remedy so great an evil, he caused his army to make a halt, and went himselfe with incredible hast to sett things in order again: But in his going, O how vexed was he against that Prince, and what disturbance was in his thoughts, who one minute before was full of hopes to conquer, and now in danger to be conquer'd, and that easily: and indeed, during this crosse conjuncture, Cyrus had reason to fear that the Massagettans would take advantage of this great disorder; for a huge Army might be seen upon a sudden to stagger, and one might here see the Massagettans found their Trumpetts and beat their Drums, and move in Battallia, as if they intended to fall upon the Army of Cyrus.

Now did he think the dismall answer of the Sihill would be fulfilled; that he should infallibly fall into the Power of Thomiris: That Mandana's Liberty would be lost, and that his Rivall would presently enjoy her. Yet since his great soul did not sink under the burthen of this injury, he bestirred himself to remedie the disaster; and to that end, he caused some Troopes of the second Brigade to advance, and supply the place of those whom the King of Hircania had carried away and left void. But though Cyrus did bestirre himself with as much Prudence as quicknesse; yet certainly, if Ariantes had then assaulted the Army Cyrus, that Prince who never before had bin Conquered had now lost the Victory, and perhaps his life. But the Heavens did more favour him, then to let him Page 177 lose his Glory by the fault of another. And fortune, who uses to favour great and Heroique attempts, would not let the Massagettans see the advantage which was offered them, for they did not perceive what the King of Hircania had done: And the incomparable Cyrus had so quickly filled up all the void places which those Troopes who went into the boggs had quitted, that not one of the Commanders of Thomiris Armie did ever observe it; and the motion of their Army was caused onely because they would enlarge their Battalia, and make room for their second Division to draw up more conveniently: So that making a stop within four hundred Paces of Cyrus his Army, it was evident they had no design to fall on. On the other side, this great Captain, desiring at any rate to reduce things into right order, did send to the King of Hircania, such expresse and positive orders to return in all hast with his Troopes, and caused it to be spoken so earnestly in the presence of his men what danger the whole Armie was exposed unto, that whether hee would or no, they would obey: and so they did; for the Troopes which he conducted, did so quickly obey, and crossed the boggs so hastily, that they were presently on their first ground. Thus by the wise conduct of Cyrus, the whole Army was in such order as he desired, before 'twas night. This Prince had so much Command over himself, that hee received the King of Hircanias excuse extreemly sweetly, lest if he had not, he should not be so well served the next morning, as he desired to be. Yet he was vexed to the soul to see this crosse adventure had retarded fighting: But since there was no remedie, he took care for the safety of the Camp, as Ariantes did for his. So that both securing themselves, by severall Courts of Guard; A hush silence was in both these huge Armies which were overshadowed with night: yet the common darkness was lessened by reason of many fires which the Souldiers made in both Campes, which were so near each other, that those who stood upon the hills a little distance off, could not perceive any interval which parted them: But the wonder was, the night was not disturbed with either true or false alarum from either side; but all were in as calme a silence, as if it were in the most solitary desert: yet the Camp of Cyrus saw through the Enemies Army some artificial fires, which those who defended the Fort of Sauromates did continually cast up, which made it manifest that they were assaulted; and that the silence which then reigned was not a silence of peace, which would not be broken after Sun was up, unless by the harmonie of Birds. Truth is, there was not a souldier in both Armies which did not certainly know that there would be a generall Combate the next day: for the scituation of both Camps was such, as was equally impossible to retreat without the danger of defeat by being forced to fight in disorder and confusion. For being both inclosed within a Plain compassed about with wood, one might well say that both Nature and Fortune did contribute unto a necessity of fighting. But Cyrus, being incomparable in all things, did teach his men by his own example, that brave men must expect great dangers in silence, & without inquiettesse. Therefore as soon as he had visited all the Courts of Guard, which he had placed for the safety of his Camp: he passed the rest of the night in a Tent, which stood in the head of his Infantry: he commanded also that they should wake him, an hour before day; as if he had thought his desire of Glory not enough to do it: yet his men could not obey him; for as hasty as they could be, he was before them. And Mazares, Mysiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Artamas, were no more sluggards then that valiant Prince whom they followed. But though the night had been husht and quiet, yee Aurora was tumultuous: The fires of both Camps extinguished as the starres did; And there was then in both Campes a noise composed of so many severall noises, and such an Echoing Murmure as all the field was fill'd with it. The Birds themselves, (except such as live upon what death allows them, and alwaies follow Armes) did forsake the Woods all about: and as the night spake the soft language of Peace, the break of day spoke in the thunder of War, with as grim as it looked; yet had something of delight in it. In the mean time, as quick as the Suns Course is, yet Cyrus had given his last orders before it appeared in our Horizon: and gave them with so much judgement, and made those who received them, to understand them so well, as if he had inspired both spirits and hearts fit to execute them: his whole Army moved together in an instant all at once, and kept such evennesse, as they came close to the Enemy without the least disorder, though they went with such an impetuosity, as the presence of Cyrus used to inspire into all his Troopes; and which without any rashnesse, onely made their vigour and impatience of fighting to appear. In the mean time, on that side towards the right wing, there was a Page 176 tall and thick Wood, which the valiant and experienced Terez had lined with a thousand Archers, who began to fight; yet found he not that advantage which he expected: for Cyrus foreseeing that the Massagettans would not leave that place unlined, he caused a party of Horse to fall upon that thousand Archers, and placed some foot also amongst his horse, between every squadron. So that these Archers being vigorously charged, they were forced to yield: yet saved not themselves by flying, for they were every man of them killed upon the place where they lay in ambuscado. But the prudence of Cyrus moving him to think that his Troops might be squandered in the Wood, he commanded Mazares to wheel about the Wood to the right hand, with his first brigade, to prevent that disorder. So as this Generous Rivall obeying him, Cyrus in the head of the second brigade, and towards the left side of the Wood he advanced to the Enemy, with all the Gallants of his Army: and advanced with the same valour, wherewith he had vanquished others. In the mean time Mazares, who was as valiant as amorous, and who was well knowing in the art of War, wheeled about the Wood without any disorder, and to lose no time, he caused the body which he commanded to draw towards the right hand, to the end he might assault the Massagettans on the flank, whilst Cyrus assaulted them in the Front.

The ambitious Octomasades who commanded the left wing of the Massagettans, was extremely surprised, when contrary to his expectation he saw himself assaulted on two sides; for he was confident in the thousand Archers which Terez had placed in the Wood, through which he knew any must passe before they could come and assault him on that side: yet for all his surprise, he behaved himself like a man of courage: and though he might be taxed with want of a little foresight; yet could not be accused for want of valour; And indeed he did very gallantly resist some squadrons which assaulted him: but without successe: For as there is nothing so dangerous as to alter the orders of Troops, in the face of a terrible Enemy. So upon the very first shock Mazares broke many squadrons of Thomiris; So that the Troops of Octomasades tumbled one over another as soon as Cyrus charged them in Person; and fled with so much precipitation, as never was the like disorder seen.

But since this valiant Prince knew that flying Enemies are already overcome, he never followed them; but desiring to find a more noble subject unto his valour; he appointed Mazares to vanquish the Cavalry which he had already squandered, lest they should rally again; and went himselfe straight unto the Enemies Infantry, against whom he did even miracles, as afterwards you shall hear; But that you may better see, how victory followes Cyrus and none else; It chanced that whilst he had put to flight all that stood in head against him, and thought it not fit to follow them, and whilst he wheeled about his squadrons against the Massagettan Infantry, not one of his men being out of Rank, he conceived himself able to go behind the Army of Thomiris, and advantageously fall upon that victorious wing which had routed Cressus, whose Brigade indeed was the deciding point of the Battle.

Thus it may well be said, that his Prudence and his Valour were almost equal gainers; and forced Fortune to render Justice unto the equity of his cause; & he routed them. However the eternally renowned Cyrus did not quietly enjoy this greet glory which he had gotten and well deserved: for since his Rivall was yet living, and Mandana not released, he thought himself not at all happy. Yet he was joyed to hear that his intelligence concerning Ciaxares was not true; yet those reports did not rise without some ground: for doubtlesse, the King of Medes was so extremely grieved at this last carrying away of Mandana, that he fell so extremely sick, as all in Ecstasy feared his death, and all the Kingdome thought him dead. Cyrus was not joyed at this newes only, because he loved Ciaxares, though he had held him Prisoner; but also because the Princesse should not be grieved at her Fathers death at a time when she was deprived of all consolation, and loaded with all miseries. And that she might hear nothing of it, he made continuall skirmishes upon all favourable occasions.

But after Cyrus had entirely defeated the left wing of his Enemies (as I told you had assaulted the Infantry of the Massagettans, and assaulted them in such order and vigour without the least disorder in his owne, hee also routed the Infantry of Callipides; those of the Issedons; and quite defeated those of the two Scythian Kings.

Page 177 But when he was in this glorious condition, wherein hee might well hope to be quickly Conqueror, he saw upon a sudden the pittifull-state unto which his left wing was brought; and plainly saw, that all did absolutely depend upon those Forces which were with him. So that to lose no time, in following those whom he had already Routed; he thought onely of Conquering those, who had Routed his men. So that after he had by his looks put fresh hearts into his men, he forsook his new got Victory and went to fall upon that part of the Army of Thomiris which had routed him; and finding them all carelesse, and in such a negligence as Victory useth to put them into, who know not how to use it after it is gotten, he entirely defeated them without much pain. And so it happened, that those who escaped the Victory of Cyrus by flying, were met withall by Mazares. Thus the illustrious Cyrus had the glory to vanquish those, who vanquished him; Entirely to defeat the two wings of his Enemies Army; and to have vanquished a great part of Thomiris her foot. There remained now, none but a huge body of Infantry to fight with, which being composed onely of Massagettans, were placed near the Artillery of that Army: and who seemed to stand in such a resolute Posture, that it was easie to see that they would defend their lives and liberties, with the last drop of that blood; the valiant Terez commanded this body: but being very lame by reason of the former received wounds, hee could not ride; but alwaies was carried in a little Chariot. This old experienced Captain, being thus in the head of these Massagettans, Cyrus assaulted them; and he made the more hast, because hee understood by some Prisoners which were taken, that the Prince Aripithis was coming up with a Puissant Army of Sauromates, and that hee was already in the Wood; also understanding that Mazares (who was in pursuite of those whom he routed) had not met with Aripithis, hee thought it best to fall on this Enemy before the other was joyned. Yet he had but few horse with him, for they were all busie in Pillaging after the last Victory. But for all that, or without staying for the body of his Reserve, he courageously charged the Enemy, though hee had but few horse to back him. But after he had beaten all the severall bodies of Thomiris Army, and not finding Ariantes, he charged this in hopes of meeting with him. However Terez seeing Cyrus come in with such fury, yet moved not: but commanded his men not to draw an Arrow untill all their Enemies were within lesse then Arrow-shot; But when Cyrus was within that distance, Terez that old Souldier, opened his Battalions, and gave such a volley from their Engines, and Bowes, that the Aire was obscur'd, and the Army of Cyrus extremely galled; and if the extream valour of that Prince had not held up their hearts, those who vanquished others had now been vanquished themselves. But as good luck was, Terez had no Cavalry to repulse them, and so since he could make no advantage of their disorder, they did not recoil: but Cyrus did so enhearten them, that he led them on again. But Terez having time enough to charge his Engines again, this second assault had no better successe then the first. And it was the third time before the Conqueror of Asia could break these fierce Enemies, though he did things which were absolute Prodigious; and though the Princes with him did signalize themselves by a thousand acts of courage. Yet all this resolute valour of these Massagettans, was uselesse to them; for Cyrus having caused the body of his reserve to advance; and some other Troops whom hee had sent in pursuite, being returned, he compassed about this valiant Infantry on all sides. So as these courageous Massagettans, having no way left but to render themselves, and since they might do it with honour, they made such signes as those use who demand quarter, and the illustrious Cyrus desiring to save the lives of such brave men, advanced towards them to take their words, and to give him; but since he advanced without making any sign of giving quarter, they thought he came to assault them, so that discharging their engines and Arrows afresh, all those who followed Cyrus, saw that Prince in such imminent danger, that out of their loves to him, they fell upon these valiant Massagettans without any orders, and so assaulted them on all sides at once, that they quite broke them, and dispersed their Battalions: In the mean time, Cyrus moved with a generous Passion to see so many brave souldiers like to perish, his action was as glorious, in striving to save them as it was a little before in Page 178 killing others; for maugre all the tumult and confusion, hee ran into the midst of the Conquered, and Conquerors, crying as loud as ever he could that quarter should be given to the Massagettans, menacing with heroiue fury, all those who helped him to get the victory, if they did not pardon the Conquered and obey him. This command was no sooner heard, but presently the Souldiers of Cyrus ceased killing, and the Massagettans charmed with the clemency of their Conqueror, threw down their Armes, and flocked all about him, looking upon him then as their Protector, whom a minut before they fought against as their enemy: Indeed their was not an Officer, who did not desire the honour of rendring himselfe unto that Prince, and not a common souldier who at least longed not to come near him, and they seemed not sorry for losing the Battle, since so great and clement a Prince had gotten it; and their actions were so significative to express the high thoughts they had of this Hero's clemency, that words needed not to express them; for maugre the tumult which could not be appeased in an instant, they acknowledged that their joyes to see their illustrious Conqueror did much comfort them for being Conquered.

In the meane time, Cyrus knowing that Conquerors must never sleepe in the Armes of a Victory, as soone as he had saved the live of these valiant Massagettans, had given Orders for the safety of the Prisoners, and had commanded to have a care of the body of the valiant Terez, who was killed at this bout, hee intended presently to Rallie his victorious Troopes, purposely to relieve Mazares, in case he had met and were repulsed by Aripithis; and to goe himselfe and fall upon the Prince of Sauromates, if he durst come out of the Woods unto the Plaines. But as he was busied in Rallying them together, Mazares who had been in pursuite of his Enemies, arrived, and acquainted Cyrus, that Aripithis not daring to engage him in the Plaine, kept still in the Woods, where he had received into the narrow passes, the Troopes which he had broken; adding, that for all this, he pursued them hastily, and understood by some prisoners taken in the Woods, that the Forces of Aripithis which had not fought, were retreated in such confusion, that one could hardly discern them from those who defeated them. But can you not learne from those Prisoners (said Cyrus, after he had in few words commended Mazares for what he had done) the reason why I should not meet with Ariantes all this day, though I have most carefully sought for him? nor can you not learne where Thomiris was during the fight? or in what place the Prince her Sonne fought? As for Ariantes sir, replied Mazares, you were not likely to meet him, for whilst you sir were defeating the Left-wing of his Army, he fought in the Right, and routed your Left-wing: so that whilst you were assaulting his Infantry, he left the wing which he commanded, to helpe those whom I pursued; but seeing he could not, and knew by those whom you routed, that you had vanquished his victorious wing; he went to joyne with Thomiris, who stayed in that part of the wood where Aripithis was to come. So that seeing no likelihood of victory, they sent Orders to those Forces which were before the Fort, to retire, and they themselves also are retired: Aripithis staying farre in the wood with his forces, I did not think good to engage him in the narrow Passes, but came to you sir, to tell you, that there is none who can dispute the victory to you, but as for Spargapises I know nothing. Mazares had no sooner done speaking, but Cyrus desiring to teach his men by his example, that all blessings come onely from heaven, he fell downe upon his knees, and looking up to the Sunne, which is the adored Deity of the Persians, he gave thanks for the victory: Thus he was seene victorious in the midst of a field full of dead and dying men, under the homage of his valour unto the God whom he adored. All his Troopes after his example did the like, and every one according to the Religion of his Country, did the like gratitude for such a signall victory: indeed never was any more compleat, the whole Army of the Enemy was vanquished, not a squadron unscattered and undispersed. Few of the Officers, but what were either kill'd or prisoners: the valiant Terez dyed in the head of that couragious Infantry which fought the last: All the Enemies Engines and Batteries were taken, and served for a Trophie of Glory unto the Conqueror; their Baggage enriched all the Souldiers of Cyrus his Army; and in testimony of this great Page 179 Conquerors victory, he incamped in the Enemies Campe; but his greatest glory was, that Myrsiles, Artamas, Intaphernes, Atergates, Gobrias, Gadates, Indathirses, and all that were at this great dayes worke, did publish aloud, that Cyrus alone wonne the batle.

And it is most certaine, without any flattery of him, that the prudence by which he guided his valour, did get him the day; for had he not restrained the impetuosity of his courage, and the forwardness of his Troopes, when he had broken the Left-wing of his Enemies, things had not succeeded so happily. For Cressus having led on his Troopes with a little too much precipitation, they were presently routed; not but that hee did signalize himselfe upon that occasion, and shewed much courage; but yet after he had received a great wound in his right Arme, and was carryed out of the fight, he had the sorow to see that wing which he commanded quite put to flight; many battalians of his Infantry tome in pieces, all his Engines taken by the Massalgettans; and indeed to have seene all his men perish, had not the body of Reserve advanced in the Areare to their reliefe. Thus one would have said, that the victory had been on both sides; for the Right-wing of Cyrus, where he himselfe was, did rout the Left-wing of Thomiris: and the Right-wing of Thomiris, where Arian[tes was, did rout the Left-wing of Cyrus.

But whilst this double victory was on either side, the Infantry was not idle; for that of Cyrus advanced against that of the Massagettans. After all, the most pleasing of his thoughts upon this occasion was, to imagine that the noise of his victory would reach Mandana; and that she would thank him for what he had done to deliver her.

As he was thus enjoying the sweet fruits of his victory, in thinking upon his Princess, Chrisantes came hastily to him, and told him, that one of the Prisoners who had the honour to be taken by his own hand, was the Prince Spargapises. How? (said Cyrus) the Son of Thomiris my Prisoner? Yes Sir, (replied Chrisantes) But those unto whom you committed all the Prisoners in guard, having observed that this Prince whom they knew not, had made more endeavours to escape then any of the rest, and seeing that they had a great number to guard, they bound him for the more securitie; but a Massagettan who had seen me heretofore with you at the Tents Royall, not being able to endure the Son of his Queen to be in that condition, and considering that I could not know him, because he was at Issedon, when you Sir were with Thomiris, he acquainted me who he was, in hopes of better usage: but Spargapises hearing and observing that I understood his language, he called unto me: Since I cannot conceal my selfe (said he unto me) I pray let Cyrus know how his men use me like a slave, and I desire so much favour from him, as to be treated as a Prisoner of Warre, and not to be tyed up as I am. This Prince had no sooner said so, but going to him, I endeavoured to let him know that you would be extremely sorry for the usage he had received, and I would presently have caused him to be unbound, but he who had the chief command of the guard not being there, the Souldiers who understood not what that Prince said unto me, would not lose him, so that I came in all hast to acquaint you Sir, that you may give orders for it. Cyrus no sooner heard what Chrisantes said, but he imagined that Mandana would be loaded with the same chains Spargapises was, and that Thomiris would revenge upon her the hard usage her Sonne had received, so that being both griev'd and vexed at what his men had done, though he was very glad of such a Prisoner, he sent Hidaspes with Chrisantes to cause him to be delivered, and to bring him to his Tent, commanding them to tell Spargapises, that he had rather have been bound himselfe, then to see so great a Prince as he in such a condition.

Hidaspes and Chrisantes, according to the orders of Cyrus, went to Spargapises, and unbound him with their own hands, after they had told him what Cyrus had said: As long as they spoke, this young Prince (who was very lovely, though of a surly deportment) did hearken to them without any interruption, but he hearkened unto them with such a fretting look, as made it seem he took his misfortune with much impatency, so that desiring to comfort him, they added unto what Cyrus had 4 pages missing Page 184 also charged him with a Letter to Doralissa, Feraulas another to Martessia; Hidaspes and Gobrias desired him to enquire very carefully whether a Lady came unto Thomiris, whose name was Arpasia, conducted by a man whose name was Licander. Adonacris also writ by him unto Agathirses, who he knew was with Thomiris, and thereby moved him to compose things as much as he could: And Anabaris also writ unto all his friends which he had in that Court to do the like. Thus Ortalgues was charged with so many different commissions, that he stood in need of all his wit to acquit himselfe well of them all: Mazares had a good mind to send one unto Mandana, but he Mastered himselfe, and contented himselfe with thinking upon her, without moving her to think upon him. In the mean time, Cyrus talked a long while with Anacharsis in private; after which, that sage Scythian went with the Envoy of Thomiris, who went next the Chariot which carryed the Corps of Spargapises: But assoon as they were gone, Cyrus gave himselfe wholly to fitt his Army for an advance towards the Tents Royall, in case Thomiris did not change her mind, as there was no great likelihood she would. In the mean time Cyrus was in such a miserable condition, as no signes of any victory was to be seen in him. Thomiris and Ariantes suffered incredible torment of mind; and Mandana, though a Captive, yet had more sweet minutes then they all had; for since the fame of Cyrus his victory had reached her ear, maugre all the oppositions of Ariantes, she was extremely well satisfied, and talked merrily with Doralissa: and Martessia. The Princesse Istrina, and the Princess of Bithina, were joyed beyond measure, for they verily believed that it was advantageous for them that Cyrus should be Conqueror; and the fair Arpasia, whom Licanider had brought unto Thomiris, was in the same mind.

In the meane time, Ariantes used all his endeavour to Rally that Army which Cylrus had Routed: and gave all requisite orders for securing and guarding the narrow passes in the Wood, that his Rivall might not advance towards the Tents Royall, untill all the Forces of Thomiris were joyned. Aripithis who bore a deadly hatred unto Cyrus, because he was perswaded, that if Thomiris had not loved him, he should have been happy; therefore he endeavoured all he could to give a stop unto the Victories of that Prince. Yet he wished with all his heart that Mandana were out of the Power of Thomiris, and his mind was so ravell'd that he knew not himself what to wish. Since his Troopes did not yet fight, he stayed at the entry into the wood, to stop Cyrus if he advanced. So it happened, that when Spargapises was killed a Prisoner escaped, for this accident made such a noise, as the Prisoners were more carelessly guarded; their souldiers lurking some nights in the woods, at lest came to the place where Aripithis was. This Prince knowing hee had been a Prisoner unto Cyrus, asked him what newes; The souldiers having but a confused knowledge of Spargapises death, said, that that Prince was taken: That the souldiers of Cyrus bound him, and carried him into a Tent separate from theirs, and that a little time after it was said he was dead. Yet adding afterwards, that the souldiers of Cyrus said he killed himself. Aripithis desiring no more, then to drive Cyrus out of the heart of Thomiris, made use of this report, to that end; Not that he did suspect Cyrus would ever kill Spargapises: but knowing that Thomiris was of a violent spirit; and that the tale of this souldier was something probable, and enough to make that Queen think that Cyrus had treated her son very ill; he moved this souldier by large promises of recompence, to tell Thomiris the same tale he told him, and to chuse his time when he should be present. At first, this souldier dorred at it: for the valour and clemency of Cyrus having gain'd his heart, he was unwilling to infuse any suspicions of cruelty into Thomiris. But at last, Aripithis telling him, that it highly concerned Thomiris to know it, and joyning menaces with his promises, he undertook it. So that as soon as Aripithis came to the Tents Royall and was with Thomiris, this souldier presented himselfe, and told the Queen what he had told Aripithis: to wit, that the Prince her Son was taken Prisoner; that they bound him; that he was carried into a Tent by himselfe; and that presently after it was reported he was dead, which made such a hurley burley, that in the interim he escaped. Thomiris no sooner heard this from the souldier, but Aripithis Page 185 added, that he knew as much from two others, though he durst not tell her. Is it possible (cried out Thomiris) That my Son should be dead? Dead by orders from Cyrus? Is Cyrus capable of such a bloody Act, against all the Lawes of Honor or War? Is his hatred of me so high, as it makes him violate all manner of Rights? Since so, I must and will be revenged. As she pronounced these words, one came and told her, that Anacharsis was come with the messenger she sent to Cyrus; and brought the body of the Prince her Son. She no sooner heard this, but all in a fury, she went out, and passed from Tent to Tent, untill she came unto one which opened into a great Plain, as if she would her self go see whether this was true or no: But as soon as she came into this great Tent, she saw the Coffin in which the Prince her Son did lie. This sad object both grieving and amazing her, and her mind being also highly incensed to think that the man whom of all the World she loved best, should kill her Son, she was almost starke mad. She no sooner saw the Coffin, but after such a sad cry; as would have tendered a heart of stone, she addressed her self unto Anacharsis: How durst you (said she unto him with eyes full of fury) bring me any thing from the murthe[rer of my Son? who certainly would never have sent me his Corpes, but because hee hoped it would be my death. The Phrase you give Madam unto that great Prince who sent me to you, doth so ill and so little sute unto him, (said Anacharsis to her) that I am forced to interrupt your Majestie, and to hinder you from wronging the Generous, and most illustrious Prince upon Earth. Ah Anacharsis (cried shee) I must interrupt you: For I cannot endure to hear a Prince commended who has treated my Son so ill, who caused him to be bound like a slave, and who has most inhumanely stabbed him. I beseech you Madam (replied Anacharsis) be pleased to receive the truth from my mouth, and harken not unto those Lies which are belched out by the Enemies of Cyrus. For believe it Madam; confidently believe it, that Cyrus never treated Spargapises ill: But on the Contrary, sent in all hast to unbind him; and was grieved to the soul when he heard that young and generous Prince had stabl[ed] himself, as soon as ever he was unbound. Since I was not in the Tent where that unfortunate Prince dyed, replied she, I cannot directly tell the passages: But I am sure that in all likelihood, Cyrus caused him to be killed. For he was bound, and none of the Prisoners besides; he was carried into a Tent by himselfe: and as soon as two men came to him from Cyrus, his death was presently published. Also though it bee as you say; yet Cyrus is not innocent: for though my son did not die by any order from him, yet the rigour which was used to him, did cause his death: and therefore I charge you to say no more in his behalf; but command you to tell him from mee, that I declare eternal War with him: That in revenge of my sons death, I will loaden Mandana with more Irons, then that unfortunate Prince carried. And that within a few daies I will send him back the Corps of that Princesse whom he adores, in the same Coffin which brought my Sonne. As she said so, the Prince Ariantes coming to her, and hearing these words, hee grew pale with fear and wonder; So that his love of Mandana moving him, he was necessitated to justifie his Rivall, lest the violence of Thomiris should become dangerous. Also shee had no sooner pronounced terrible words, but Ariantes spoke unto her with as much reverence as sorrow: you know Madam (said he unto her) that Fate hath brought me into that condition, as I can never be a friend unto Cyrus: but have many reasons to hate him; Yet for al that, honour bids me tell your Majesty, that I can never believe that Cyrus did either use ill or kill the Prince Srgapises; for he is one that stands more upon his glory, then to have his hand in any base act; and I must tell you Madam, that Mandana being in your hands, it is not credible he should ever do such a thing. I know (said she unto him) that this Prince had no reason for it, but I know better, that howsoever it was, he was the cause of my sonnes death, and if I cannot be revenged upon him, yet I ought, and will upon Mandana, and therefore (added she, transported with fury) I take it ill you should set limits to my vengeance, and justifie the murtherer of a Prince in presence of his Corps, and unto whom you should have been subject. For Heavens sake Madam (said Atacharsis then) stifle all these thoughts, and let your reason surmount your sorrows; for I am most confident, that [Page 186 to morrow you will repent of this daies thoughts. I have already told you (replied she) that I will hearken no more unto you; yet tell Cyrus, that if within three daies he will come and put himselfe into my fetters, I will spare Mandana's life, if he will not, I will take my course, and in lieu of seeing her in triumph, as he hoped, he shall see her in Spargapises Cosfin. Anacharsis and Ariantes seeing her so incensed, would have said something to appease her fury; but abruptly left them, after she had given three commands. The First, to set the Corps of Spargapises in one of her Tents, in the hands of Religious men: the second to double the guards upon Mandana: and the third, that Anacharsis should depart that very minute, and not speak unto any one living. And indeed this wise and victorious Scythian, was forced to obey this unjust Princess, and carry unto Cyrus the saddest news that ever he received, since Mazares told him at Synope, that Mandana was drowned.

ARTAMENES, OR THE GRAND CYRUS. THE TENTH AND LAST PART. BOOK I.

SINCE Ortagues was not with Anacharsis when he had audience from Thomiris, because he was busied in discharging himself of those Letters which he took upon him to deliver; Those who were to see Anacharsis depart that very hour from the Tents Royall, never thought upon him: So that Anacharsis with those who waited upon the Corps of Spargapises, went away without Ortagues. But when Anacharsis came to the last guard of the Massagetans, which was at the strait passage in the wood; and began to think upon the Gulfe of sorrow which the soule of Cyrus would be plunged into, to reflect upon all the miseries of this life, and to consider the sad consequences which do commonly follow all violent Passions: How happy did he think himselfe, in that he had wholly subdued all his passions unto his reason? and that he was above the reach of fortune, in scorn[ing] all that shee was able to do unto him, and in applying himselfe only unto the love of vertue, and study of Philosophy; yet he stood in need of all his wisdom, to keep himself from murmuring against the gods whom he adored, for exposing Cyrus unto so many disastrous adventures; But his greatest care was, to find out such words as might sweeten that message which he was to deliver unto him from Thomiris: yet that labour was saved; for this revengfull Princesse imagining that Anacharsis would not deliver her message in such tearms as shee expressed, did send an emissary of her own unto Cyrus; not only to see that her message was fully delivered, but also to know his precise answer. So that though this envy from Thomiris did set out two hours after Anacharsis, yet making more hast then he did, he overtook him, before he came to the Fort of Sauromates, where Cyrus was. Thus this wise Scythian had not power to lessen his sorrows, by concealing a little, the fury of Thomiris; for he was sure that this messenger would speak her message in Page 2 her own words. However, this great and miserable Prince no sooner knew that Anacharsis was returned with a messenger from Thomiris but his heart and spirits did begin to beat a turbulent and disordered pulse: hopes and feares did successively raise and deject him. There was then present with him, Mazares, Artamas, Atergates, Intaphernes, Hidaspes, Araspes, and Aglatidas. But though much inquietude and impatience appeared in all their faces; yet it was easie to discern, that Cyrus and Mazanes had such a curiosity to know the business of this envy from Thomiris, as could not possibly proceed but from one and the same passion. Indeed, they had both of them such a desire to heare how that Queen received the news of her Sons death, and were so affraid least she should have some revenging resolutions upon Mandana, as they expressed their sorrows and their feares in every wrinkle of their faces. They did communicat their sadnesse and impatency by their very looks: Though Mazanes did still strive as much as ever he could to hide some part of his resentments, purposely to hide his love from his generous Rivall, with whom he neither could nor would dispute for Mandana, yet he had much ado. But at last Cyrus commanded that Anacharsis should enter, and the messenger from Thomiris to stay in the next Tent untill he was a little instructed what to say unto him. Come wise Anacharsis, (said Cyrus to him, as soon as he appeared) how has Thomiris received you? Alas Sir, (replied he and sighed.) I would the fidelity that I owe unto you would permit me to disguise some part of that Princess sury from you: But since you must know it, and since this messenger will not mince it, I must tell you, that this unjust Queen did receive me so unworthy both of you and her selfe, that even the very worst is to be feared, and nothing that is good is to be hoped for Alas Anacharsis (cried Cyrus out) so there be nothing to feare concerning Mandana: Let fortune do her worst, any way else, and I will freely abandon my selfe unto the furie of Thomiris: But what's her grief? and what unjust revenge does she draw from the death of Epargapes? Sir (said Anacharsis then) since it is not impossible but her mind may change since I left her, I conceive it fityou know what this messenger will tel you, before I impart what she commanded me to say unto you, for upon second serious consideration, I cannot beleeve she can continue in such unjust thoughts, but will even abhorre her own injustice. Since you will not tell me what Thomiris said (replied Cyrus) you give me some cause to think that she does intend the most horrid cruelty in the world; And that shee intends to loaden the Princess Mandana with the weight of her Irons. Anacharsis, being desirous to make him feare the very worst, did returne him two or three (something) indirect an[swers]; to the end that fearing the worst, he might apprehend less feares, afterwards. So that Cyrus imagining, that perhaps Thomiris intended to put Mandana to death broke out into such sad expressions, as Anacharsis thought it time to tell him the truth: and so in few words he acquainted him, that Thomiris did accuse him for killing her son; and commanded him to tell him, that if he did not render himselfe within three dayes under her power, shee would send back the body of Mandana in the same Coffin, in which he sent the body of her Son. Yet to your comfort Sir (continued is Anacharsis) I must in all tell you, that the Prince Ariantes does all he can to justifie you in the opinion of Thomiris, and you may be assured his disposition is such, as that he will oppose the fury of this incensed Queen, as much as ever he can. Alas Anacharsis (cried out Cyrus in a sad dispaire) nothing can stop the reveng of such an humour as, Thomiris is off: And, I see my self in the saddest condition of any man in the world. For my particular (said Mazanes with much sadness) I am perswaded that Thomiris for her own interest will not put Mandana to death. But I am fully perswaded (replied Cyrus) that shee will; only be revenged upon mee, unless I will ruine my selfe: And I am fully resolved to do it, rather then hazard this most excellent Princess. However I must heare what the messenger from this cruell Queen will say: Then commanding he should enter, this Massagetan told Cyrus, that Thomiris fearing Anacharsis should not fully deliver his message she sent him, to let him know that if within three dayes, he did not render himselfe unto her, she would put Mandana to death, and send him her Corps. Will you unjust Queen, (replied Cyrus sternly) that within this three dayes shee that have my answer: and tell her also; that if shee offer any violence unto the Princess Mundana, I will not pardon one of the Prisoners who are in my Page 3 hands; and laying aside that respect which hitherto I ever bore her, though shee was my enemy, I will most hotly pursue her, untill I have revenged the Princess whom shee shall wrong; Yet I will hope, that you will find the mind of the Massagetan Queen changed when you are returned to her; and that she will repent of her injustice and cruelty, against a Prince who never offended her: But once more, I charge you to tell her, it is her best to take heed of injuring the Princess. Mandana: assure her, it concerns the lives of all the Prisoners which are, or ever shall be in my power. After this, Cyrus having dismissed the messenger, he was a while silent, considering what to resolve upon. At first, he thought it best to march immediately to the Tents Royall, to force the passes; and in the head of his Army, to save the life of his Princess: but afterwards considering that the more he pressed upon Thomiris, the more reason he had to fear Mandana, and than the nearer the Massagetan Queen was unto her ruine, she would the sooner hasten Mandanas, he knew not what to resolve upon. But as his great heart advised him to fight, so his love perswaded him, rather then to hazard his Princess, to put himselfe into the hands of Thomiris: Provided she would release Mandana, yet since it was not likely she would release her, though he should put himselfe into her power, he rejected that thought as well as the rest. In the mean time, considering the state of things, he must either submit himself her Prisoner, or endanger the life of Mandana. So as not knowing what to resolve upon, his mind was so turbulent, as not being able to enclose his sorrows in his own heart; for heavens sake (said he unto all the company) tell me each of you, what you think to be my best course, and what I should do, not to hazard the life of my Princess? But I beseech you, consider only her, and never care what becomes of mee: Advise me what I shall do to save her, and never consider my Army, nor my Conquests, nor my life, for I am so farre from all these considerations, that I do not value my own Glory, in competition of her safety. And though it be a shame for the Conqueror of Thomiris to take her fetters upon him; yet I am most ready to do it, unlesse you can find out some other way to keep my Princess from perishing. I know ther's none amongst you who dare tell me, it is requisite to receive fetters from the hands of a Queen whom I have conquered, but unlesse you find me out some better expedient, I shall tell it unto my self: For my part Sir, (said Anacharsis) I conceive the best expedient is to draw the businesse out at length, by returning a dubious answer, and so gaine time for the Prince Arcantes either to perswade Thomiris unto reason, or else till he gett himselfe into a condition able to give a stop unto her violences. Alas wise Anacharsis (said Cyrus) It seems you are ignorant of the height of that passion which possesseth me, since you think it possible I should love, even but a few dayes, in such a cruel incertainty. The truth is, (added Mazanes most sadly) minuts wherein the life of Mandana is feared, seem very long unto those who are nearly interested in her. Since I am well acquainted with the power of Love, replied Intaphernes, I do easily understand your meaning: but to speak unto the businesse (as I do think) I can never beleeve that Queen who had never made warre, but only to make her self loved, will ever give so great a provocation of hatred unto him of whom shee desires to be loved, as this, to put the Princess whom he adores to death.

Since Thomiris is reported to be of a most hasty and violent temper, replied Atergatis, what you say is no security for Mandanas life: But my greatest hope is in the love of Arcantes: for since his passion hath been so high as to make him forget his duty unto the illustrious Cyrus: and so violent as to attempt so bold an act, as to carry her away before his face, doubtlesse he will be as forward and ingenious as to preserve Mandanas life, and to find out away of stopping the violence of Thomiris. Though he should not, replied Hydaspes, yet I cannot beleeve that Thomiris will offer to make any attempts upon the life of the Princess Mandana: For being freshly defeated.

It were the most senselesse peece of imprudence in the world, to incense her Conqueror, by any such cruelty, and therefore I cannot beleeve shee will ever offer it. Since shee receives fresh forces from severall places, replied Araspes, the consideration of the Battell lost will not hinder her revenge: But, as the Prince Atergates most wisely said, Ariantes will give a stop and doubtlesse oppose her with good success: for his Cause will appeare so just, that I doe beleeve all the Subjects of Page 4 Thomiris would turne Rebels, if she should command them to put the Princess Mandana to death. For my part (said Aglatidas, and addressed his speech to Cyrus) I am very well acquainted with all the resentments that, either love or jealousy can infuse, and I cannot beleeve that the Massagetan Queen will ever put the Princess Mandana to death, but only gives out this thundring threatening, to keep you Sir, from advancing towards her, untill her fresh forces be come up, and joynd unto the rest of her shattered Army. I must confess, if she were too hard pressed upon, dispaire might perchance move her unto any thing: And I do beleeve that if you were in her power, the life of Mandana would be then more in danger then it is: But as the state of things stands, I cannot think she dares revenge her selfe upon a Princess, whose death would turne all rational men living to be her enemies. I see, replied Cyrus, that you give me your opinions, of what I am to fear or hope for, but I do not see that you tell me, what I ought to do; yet something I must do: I am engaged to answer this unjust Princess; and I must answer so as may not endanger Mandana. The proposition which the wise Anacharsis made, replied Artamas, seems to me most expedient, for a dubious answer will give you time to argue with this furious Queen, and will give the Prince Ariantes also leasure to contrive the safety of Mandana. Oh Heavens, (cried Cyrus out) unto what a miserable condition am I brought? since I must expect the safety of my Princess from a Rivall whom I would have killed, and who must perish unlesse I perish my self: No no, I cannot rest in this condition: I must use more violent remedies unto the misery which torments mee: For though I should give an ambiguous answer unto this unjust Princess, yet after all, I must make it cleer, and still returne unto the same point where I was. Tis true Sir, replied Anacharsis; but to bring you unto my opinion, let me tell you Sir, than to stop the execution of any wicked act, especially an act of cruelty, there needs no more but to defer the first motions of it, for I am confident that there are very few people in the world who are so extreemly wicked, as to continue long obstinate in the intentions of any unhumane action Moreo[ver, be ple...] consider that Thomiris is not naturally wicked: The furie that is now in her mind is but a stranger, and therefore its likely, that if one give her leasure to examine the businesse she will not do what you do feare, since it is a thing opposite to her own interests. For if Mandana were out of her power, what surety had she, if she should fall into yours? whereas, she having her, she can make her peace when she pleaseth, and whensoever she is pleased to restore that Princess she is able to disarme you: Therefore Sir, let it not too much trouble you: Doe all that Prudence dictates unto you, and leave the rest unto the godds, who will never suffer so vertuous a Princess as Mandana to dye a death so tragicall. Alas, wise Anacharsis (replied Cyrus) As great a confidence as I have in the Justice of the godds, yet I dare not trust them with the life of my Princess, for their wayes are above the reach of all men: and we do so often see the innocent become miserable, and the wicked prosperous, that all Mandanas virtue, is no security to me against the injustice of Thomiris: yet I will follow your Counsell, and when the time comes give such an answer as you advise. After this, Cyrus seeming as if he desired to be alone, all the company retired, and left him at liberty to digest his own sorrows. Yet they were not so soon gone, but this terrible menace of Thomiris coming into his mind, it did so discompose all his thoughts that hee knew not what to resolve upon, and sometimes he could see no way but to put himselfe unto the power of the incensed Queen: for when he fancied Mandanas body in Spurgapisies Coffin, his reason roved and th... sad imagination, made him think Mandana really dead: yet his love suggesting many [...] multuous thoughts, he no sooner resolved upon one thing but he presently condemned it, and since he could find no way which was infallible safety for Mandana's life, he could not stay long in any one thought: and the niceness of his passion made him think that Mandana had great reason to upbraid him hereafter if he did not put himself in Prison to release her: But the greatest difficulty was how he should be sure of her safety, if he did assume her Chains: for Thomyris would not release her until he was in her fetters, and there was not reason he should assume them before she was at liberty. But alas (added he) this unjust Princess did not say she would release Mandana if I put my self into her power, but only said, that she would not put her to death: Fie, fie, cruel Thomyris (pursued Page 5 hee) can you threaten a Prince so cruelly, who when he could have killed you, did let fall the point of his Sword? and who out of his respects to you, did injure his love? unjust Princess! Can Mandana be in your power and you not love her? Can you think me culpable for being faithful to her? Can you know her and threaten her life? Is it possible any should be so cruel as to obey you, if you should command them to take away her life? yet Anacharsis heard this dismal menace from your own mouth: and I have heard it from your Emissarie. After this, the soul of Cyrus being saddened with this dismal thought, his mind was full of confused fancies, which refusing and disordering all his faculties be had not so much liberty, as to reason the matter aright for a long while: But at last, these dull Clouds beginning to dissipate, and the eyes of his reason seeing clearer, he looked upon things as he ought to do, and saw no way more rational then that which Anacharsis advised him unto. Yet since this Council did more satisfy his reason then his love, he did somewhat more then it; and sent Teracles secretly unto Arcantes, to tell him, that he committed the life of Mandana unto his Guard; Protesting unto him that his own Person should answer for hers, if Thomyris put her to death: And to shew the height of his love, he fully resolved, according as Thomyris should say after the ambiguous answer which he would make her, to put himself into the power of that Queen, Provided she would both spare the life of that Princess, and release her: So that his heart being at some rest after this resolution taken, he found himself able to think upon what answer he should send unto Thomyris, which might spin out the time to a length. And after he had well thought upon it, he resolved to send Chrisantes the third day, to tell this unjust Princess, that before he would put himself into her hands, it was requisite he should know what security she would give him for the life of Mandana, declaring unto her, that there was no other, then to set her at liberty, and send her to the King of Meades. But to have two strings unto his Bow, he intended to advance with his whole Army, the same day which Chrisantes departed, and quarter himself at the very entrance into the wood, to the end, the answer of Thomyris might be more moderate. But though this Resolution was the most reasonable which he could take, yet he was not satisfied with it: and he thought that there was a better course to be taken, though he knew not what it was so as relapsing into his complaints he was in a very miserable condition. Mazares for his part, his sufferings were incredible, and they were the more sharp, because he durst not let them be seen, least by shewing his sorrows, he should shew his love. Intaphernes and Atergatis were full of inquietudes; for they conceived that if businesse were more intangled, the Princess whom they loved would not be oversafe in the hands of Thomyris. Gobrias and Hidaspes, had the very same thoughts for Arpasia, the first, concerned as a father, the second as a lover. Myrsyles, in his affection unto Doralisa, had much sorrow, for since he knew Mandana loved her, his love made him fearful, that the revenge of Thomyris would fall also upon her: So that, whether out of interest and concernment, or out of compassion upon the miseries of Cyrus, There were very few in the whole Army who were not sufferers, and full of sorrows. But the time when Cyrus was to returne his Answer being come, Chrisantes and Feraulas, being ready to depart, the first unto the Massagettan Queen, and the other secretly unto her brother, It was told Cyrus, that a man, taken at the entrance into the wood, desired to speak with him, from Ariantes: At this very word, Cyrus trembled, not only out of hatred to his Rivall, but out of feares to heare some sad news from the Princess Mandana.

So as being extremely impatient to know what his enemy had sent unto him for, he commanded him to be brought in, and as hee was in this fearefull impatience desiring to know what he feared, This messenger from Ariantes came unto him, and speaking in a low voice, did with much exactness and reverence, deliver his message. Sir, (said he unto Cyrus) The Prince Ariantes knowing your affection unto Mandana, was afraid least you should do as the Massagettan Queen desires, out of your feares to hazard Mandana's life. Therefore, in acknowledgement of his obligations to you, and out of his desire to serve the Princess whom he adores, he hath commanded me to tell you, that you must be sure to keep your selfe out of the power of Thomyris, and as long as you did so, he would answer for the life of Mandana: But on the contrary if you did not, then perhaps, he should not be able to Page 6 save her, but Sir, Least my message should be suspected, I beseech you keep me in your custody, until the servant of yours called Ortalgues, returnes from the Tents Royall, and acquaints you with the state of things, and what the Prince Arcantes hath done for the Princess Mandana. Since he is to returne this night (added he) I shall not be long in custody, but will assure you that when you see him, you will not doubt of the sincere advice which the Prince Arcantes gives you, though he be your Rivall and your enemy.

Since I may very well doubt the honesty of a Prince who once deceived me, in carrying away the Princess Mandana, (replyed Cyrus) I will take you at your word; and since Ortalgues in to returne this night, I will set you at liberty againe to morrow morning, after this, Cyrus committing this Massagettan into the custody of those who brought him in, resolved to stay the sending of Chrisantes and Feraulas unto Thomyris that night, there being yet time enough to returne the answer hee had promised. Though this Message from Ariantes might well have been a comfort unto him, yet his inquietude redoubled: for besides his mistrust of a Rivals Message, he was in extream unpatience, until Ortalgues returned, so that he could not rest in any place: And certainly, he had great reason to desire the knowledge of what he longed for, because passages at the Tents Royall might very well alter since the departure of Anacharsis and the messenger from Thomyris. And indeed, that unjust Queen, had no sooner commanded Anacharsis to depart without speaking unto any, but Mandana's Guards were doubled: Ariantes unto whom the life of that Princess was so deere, had rather Cyrus should enjoy her, then to see her dye, and therefore, he went immediatly, and made sure of her Guards, and went to work so handsomly and happily, that unknown unto Thomyris, he was more Master of Mandana's Guard, then Thomyris was a Mistress. That which did much facilitate the design of the Prince, was because he who commanded those forces which were designed for Mandana's Guard, had a brother who was Prisoner unto Cyrus: So that being concerned in the preservation of this Princess life: Ariantes made it appeare unto him, that his brother was lost for ever, if Thomyris put Mandana to death: so that either out of a resentment of honour, or compassion, or interest of his Brother, or friendship unto Ariantes, or all, he promised rather to dye, then Thomyris should put Mandana to death. Ariantes being well satisfied with this, he went and plotted with all his friends, and endeavouring to make sure of some of those Captains which had escaped from the Battell, he told them all that was possible to make them abhorre this dismal intention of Thomyris, and justified Cyrus as much as ever he could concerning the death of Spargapices, to the end that the design of his Sister might appeare the more unjust. Furthermore Ortalgues who was concealed in a friends Tent, all the time he was in the Tents Royal, he saluted the friend of Anabaris and Adonacris, to oppose Thomyris. So as there was a great hurley burley in their Court. Moreover, Ortalgues going to visit Gelonide, he incited her to serve Mandana. But yet she could not deliver those Letters which he had for that Princess, only promised him to perswade Thomyris unto reason with all the Arguments she was able to produce. Ortalgues in this great disorder, could not deliver any of the Letters which he undertook, except those unto Adonacris and Anabaris. And the preservation of Mandana's life did so wholly take up his mind, that he could not think of any thing else. In the mean time, this unfortunate Princess wondered at the doubling of her Guards. Doralisa and Martesia, no less then shee. Yet they were grieved much more, when enquiring of one of the Guards the Cause, he told them, so as expecting every minute when Mandana's throat should be cut, these two generous minded Ladies were grieved beyond all comforts. On the other side, the Princess of Bythinia, and the Princess Istrina, having not the liberty to see Mandana, and enquiring the state of things, they were exceedingly sad. Arpasia for her part, she found her selfe in a miserable condition, by being in the Court of a Queen who was capable of so great a peece of Injustice. And Aripithis himselfe, who was the cause of all this tumult, was extremely vexed to see Thomyris as full of love as fury, and to see that the measure of the one was the measure of the other.

Though all these several Persons did suffer very much, yet all was nothing in comparison of what Thomyris suffered. For Love, Hatred, Revenge, Jealousie, and Page 7 all Passions, did shiver her heart with such violence, as I assure you she was in a most strange Condition. The truth is, after the first fury was over, she saw there was no Colour to suspect Cyrus of killing Spargapices, yet she was very Cautious of not divulging this thought: for having a Design to revenge her slighted love upon Mandana, she would still have this sad Pretence for her Revenge to blind the eyes of the People: So that though she could not see the hands of Cyrus stained with the blood of her Son, yet she would shed the blood of Mandana, purposely to take away the cause of that Princes Love; yet sometimes she doubted of his innocency, and looking upon him as the Murderer of Spargapices, she would make himself a Sacrifice upon the Coffin of her Son.

But after these tumultuous Motions had ruffled her mind, thinking sometimes that perhaps Cyrus would put himself into her Power, part of her Fury cooled, and she began to consider what she should do to justify Cyrus before the People, and justify her self before Cyrus. So that being sometimes surprized with thoughts of Revenge and hatred, and sometimes with thoughts of Love, she was ashamed at her own weakness, and abhorred her own Cruelty; but these good Intervals came not often, but commonly Fury was the Mistress of her Reason. Consider Thomyris, (would she say) and be carefull to keep up the great Pretence thou hast to be revenged of thy proud Enemy, who hath so cruelly affronted thee: and though thou art sure, he did not kill thy Son, yet still look upon him as the cause of his death; for though he were innocent, yet he is Culpable of so many others, that he deserves thy hatred. Truth is, he is a trouble to thy tranquility, he hath caused thee to lose all the innocency of thy life, and he hath made thee do things against thy own Glory. Pursue him therefore to death, and be revenged upon a Princess who is the cause of his scorning thee. Consider that the Passion which he raised in thy heart, hath sent thy Son to his Grave: and that the fire of thy love hath kindled such a Warr, as nothing perhaps will extinguish, but the blood of all thy Subjects. Sacrifice therefore Mandana as the first Victim of thy Revenge, and stay till Cyrus be himself in a condition to be Sacrificed as a Victim unto thy Resentments. But what am I doing (said she, and reprehended her self) and what do I speak in my Fury? I talk of Sacrificing a Prince who whether I will or no, does Rain in my heart, and who no sooner would be in my power, but I should be absolutely in his? Can I see Cyrus a Prisoner and look upon him with eyes and heart of hatred? yes, yes I can, for since he comes into my Chains only out of his love to Mandana, doubtless I shall hate him more then ever I loved him: After this, Thomyris being resolved to give way unto her fury, intended to move the hearts of the People by the Funerals of Spargapices; to the end so sad an Object might animate the Massagettans to revenge the death of their Prince, And indeed this sad Ceremony moved many tears. Aripithes in particular was deep in mourning, and so was Ariantes: But after the Ceremony was ended, Ariantes followed Thomyris to her Tent, and having made sure of many friends, particularly of Octomasades and Agathises, he talked to her very boldly in favour of Mandana, moving her to send her back unto Cyrus: So as this Princess being exasperated she answered him very sharply: but Ariantes was resolute and cared not; therefore: he went on, and told her all that was fit to be spoken, both for her own Glory, and the Preservation of that Princess whom he loved. For I must profess unto you, Madam, said he unto her, that since she never had been in your power but for me, I will do all that I am able to get her from you, if you offer to attempt any thing against her. Since you are able to do but little, (said she very sharply to him) I shall not much value what you do: In the mean time. I charge you to see me no more till I send for you, I will obey you, Madam, replied Ariantes, but I pray take it not ill if I do stop you in all you shall attempt against Mandana. If Cyrus do put himself under my power (replyed she) you need not fear that Princess: If he do not I shall follow my own advice, and not yours.

After this, Ariantes having left her, she went into a Tent which was her Closet, and called for Aripithes, purposely to give him severall Orders for opposing Ariantes, if he should attempt any thing: but it was to late; For this Prince had not only got almost all the Officers and Soldiers on his side, but he had also sent unto those Forces which were coming up, to make sure of them also, if need were. Moreover, Page 8 Aripithes though glad to be employed by Thomyris, yet he was very fearfull lest Cyrus should become her Prisoner; imagining that if ever Thomyris saw him, all her fury would dye. Also he being advertised that Ariantes had many friends, and that this resolution of Thomyris to put Mandana to death, did incense all men of any honour; he plainly saw that he was Master only of that body which was under his Command: And this act of cruelty seemed so horribly strange unto all the World, that he durst not absolutely trust unto that neither.

In the mean time, the wise Gelonide knowing that there was no thwarting the fury of Thomyris at first, yet now thought it time to speak, and endeavour to reduce her unto Reason: Therefore striving to insinuate her self handsomly into the mind of the enraged Queen, she did not vehemently contradict her, but on the contrary excused her violencies by some shallow reasons; so that she might afterwards without incensing her, produce more solid Arguments to persuade her. And indeed, when she was alone with Thomiris, she complained against the lamentable condition into which Fortune had brought her, and pitied her that she should be brought unto such a cruel necessity, as to be revenged upon so great a Prince as Cyrus was. For though Gelonide did wish with all her heart, that Thomiris did not love that Prince, yet as the case stood, she thought no way better to restrain her hands from the blood of Mandana, then by the interest of her love. Therefore fetching a compass the better to arrive at her end, truly, Madam, (said she unto her, after much other discourse) you are much to be pitied in your seeking revenge upon a Prince who is so much in Fortunes favour, and so much esteemed by all the World: For though they say, Revenge is sweet, yet I am persuaded that a Soul truly generous cannot seek revenge without abundance of Repugnancy, especially when it must be steeped in blood. However, Madam (added she very cunningly) I hope your Soule hath changed its Passion, and though it be troubled with the disquiet consequences of Hatred, yet it is freed from the consequences of Love; Alas Gelonide (replied she) I am more miserable then you imagine me, and this first Passion hath not driven the other out of my heart. But I beseech you, Madam (replied Gelonide) what likely-hood is there you should love Cyrus still? for if you did you would never strive to make him hate you, by persecuting Mandana, for I am most confident that Cyrus would hate you much less for persecuting himself then for persecuting her whom he adores: and therefore, Madam, if you do not hate that Prince, think seriously upon what you do, and if you will be advised by me, in lieu of menacing the life of that Princess, you shall protect it, and force that Prince by your generosity, to confess you merit his Esteem, if not his Affection. But I am most sure, Madam, that if you shed the blood of this Princess, and do not hate Cyrus, you will make your self the most miserable woman in the World: and therefore consider well upon it, if you do hate him, then I grant you may satisfy your revenge by the most cruel and fatal ways: But if you do not hate him, give a stop unto your fury, and consider that if you do put Mandana to death, Cyrus will do the like to you. And though tis possible the love of Cyrus may dye with this Princess, yet he will be sure to be your Enemy if you did put her to death. Honour doth so engage him to make Warr upon you, that though he should hereafter love you, yet he durst not entertain any peace with you. Therefore, Madam, sound your heart to the bottom, and take heed least thinking to entertain only hatred, you find it to be all love. I have heard say indeed, that these two Passions, as opposite as they are, yet do sometimes so disguise themselves in such fallacious shews, as they cannot be known from each other; and when one hath thought he acted by dictates of Hatred, it was indeed by dictates of Love. Alas Gelonide (said the Queen) I have to my shame found all this to be true: For I must with a blush confess that Cyrus is not out of my heart, and if I did not love him still, I should not seek revenge upon Mandana: However I do carry it, as if I would revenge the death of my Son, though to speak truth, my heart doth not accuse him for it: Yes, yes Gellonide, since I must open my heart unto you, I do look upon him as ungrateful towards me, and not as if he were the Murderer of Spargapises. Thus at the very same time, whilst I tax him in Publick with this horrid Crime, I do justify him in the Closet of my heart as much as I can. Since it is so, Madam, replied Gelonide, you must carry it otherwise, and not put yourself into such a State, as it will be impossible Page 9 for you to be happy, if Fortune should wheel about: For, Madam, if you do not proceed to the very last Extremity, who knows but you may hereafter have Cyrus in your Power: he may chance be your Prisoner of Warr, and may perchance become fettered in your Chains by Love, if you use Mandana well; at least this Prince will esteem you more, and may happily in the end do justice both unto your Merit and your Affection: Who knows also whether those Forces which are coming up to joyn with yours, may not get you the advantage over Cyrus, as now he hath it over you? and whether Ciaxes may not be brought to demand Peace upon no other condition, but to exchange Cyrus for Mandana? And who knows whether this happy Peace may not satisfy the Passion of Ariantes and you both? There is so little probability in all you say (replied Thomiris and sighed) that I cannot flatter my self with any thoughts of it: However, Madam, replied Gelonide, though it be not probable, yet it is not impossible. But if you put Mandana to death, it is absolutely impossible that Cyrus should either love you, or make any Peace with you? Ah Gelonide, replied she, you are a great stop to my Revenge: Why will you hinder me from the enjoyment of the only Pleasure that I can ever hope for? yet I find your words make a deep impression in my heart, and my fears to incur the hatred of Cyrus, restrain me from hating Mandana. I wish with all my heart, Madam, replied Gelonide, that I were able to ease your Majesty of your sufferings, but since I cannot, yet I would persuade you if you love Cyrus, not to provoke him to hate you, by Sacrificing Mandana unto your Revenge. For by that means I should preserve your glory, and perhaps something satisfy the passion which reigns in your Soul. As for my Glory, replied Thomiris, I value it not, for since I do not esteem my self, I care not whether others do esteem me, or no. As Thomiris was speaking this, an old Officer of hers, who had ever been very faithful and affectionate to her Service, came to tell her how he was very certainly given to understand that Ariantes was Master of all her Forces, and that he had sent unto those who were coming up, that he, who guarded Mandana was wholly at his Command; and that the People in general began to fear the anger of the Gods if she should put this innocent Princess to death; that they began to murmur, and perhaps would Rebel, if she persisted in her Design. Since this advice came from a man whom she knew most faithful, it made some impression upon her Spirits: and Gelonides discourse having prepared her Soul to receive it well, she thanked him for it; and after she had dismissed him, she began to consider unto what a miserable condition she had brought her self, and to examine seriously what Gelonide had said: Also considering that if she should put Mandana to death, it would then absolutely be impossible Cyrus should ever love her; her heart began to relent, and repent of what her Fury had hurried her unto: yet since she did not think it impossible but Cyrus might submit himself her Prisoner, to deliver his Princess, she did not repent of the Message which she had sent; yet she resolved that if he did not, then to seek out for some pretence to moderate her fury, though she did not very well know how to recall things, since they had gone so far. She asked Gelonide how she should follow her advice, in case Cyrus should not submit himself her Prisoner? Alas, Madam, said Gelonide, Violence, and Vices need Pretences; but an act of Vertue and Goodness never needs any: And therefore if your Majesty resolve to change your mind, you ought to undeceive Ariantes immediately, before things break out into a flame: For who knows whether that Prince having a pretence to accuse you of cruelty against the person he loves, will not make use of those whom he arms against you, to pull the Crown from off your head, as formerly he would have done? Disarm your self therefore, Madam, that you may disarm him: and if you will follow my advice, tell him plainly that you never had any intentions, to do as you seemed, but only to get Cyrus into your Power, and so sooner end the Warr, and better secure the Possession of Mandana unto him; you may also tell him, Madam, that the reason why your Revenge is not executed upon Mandana, is only in consideration of him. No, no (said Thomiris unto her) I cannot tell him so, for I have already told him the contrary: All I can say to him, is, that for the love of him I altered my mind. But Gelonide, when I have told the Prince my Brother so, what should I say unto Cyrus, and all those who know I have sent unto him? you may say, replied Gelonide, that you never would have used such sharp menaces, but Page 10 only to procure peace unto the people, but since you found not your expected effects, you never intended to stain your reputation, by any action of cruelty: Thus, doing nothing against the interest of your own passion, you will get much glory unto your self. I know not whether I shall get any or no (replied Thomiris and sighed) but I am sure that I deserve none; and see, I am the most culpable, and most miserable person upon the earth. In the mean time, since I have already said, that I thought Cyrus had killed my son; How can I now say, that I have changed my opinion? since you only said it in the heat of your passions and sorrowes (replied Gelonide) no solid heed will be grounded upon your words, and all the world is so persuaded, that it could never be, that though such a thing were, yet they will never accuse you. After this, Thomiris falling into a deep study; and seriously considering the danger unto which shee was exposed, especially what Gelonide said, concerning the hatred of Cyrus if she put Mandana to death, shee resolved to send for Ariantes immediately. At first, this Prince was amazed at this command, and some would have persuaded him from obedience, out of their fears this Princess should arrest him: But Ariantes being confident in his friends, especially in him who guarded Mandana, went unto Thomiris with much boldnesse. When he came to her, he askt her, whether shee sent for him, to tell him that shee had changed her mind? and she answered him so cunningly, that any but himselfe would have been deceived by her discourse; and would have believed that she had no other consideration in restraining her revenge, but what she said she had. Yet Ariantes understood well enough, that it was her passion which was the principall cause of the alteration in her mind, but he made no shew of it unto her, and was willing to take upon himselfe all the obligation. Also she added, that she never had any intentions to put Mandana to death, but only to oblige Cyrus to submit himself under her power. However, though shee spoke with abundance of seeming sincerity, yet Ariantes knew very well, that she bore an extream hatred unto Mandana: and that though Cyrus should submit himselfe, yet she might sacrifice the Princess whom he adored, if she were not hindered by force. So then fearing least Cyrus in a rapture of his passion should do as Thomiris desired, he resolved to prevent him. However, a reconciliation was made between Thomiris and Ariantes, and before they parted, they resolved upon what should be said unto the people, what Cyrus had answered, and upon what their expected forces should do, when they were come up.

After which Ariantes leaving the Princesse, he went immediately unto his Tent to dispatch away a messenger unto Cyrus, but as he was instructing him, what he should say unto his Rivall, he was told Ortalgues desired to speak with him: Indeed, this trusty servant, by the advice of Gelonide, came to tell the Prince, how he had stayed in the Tents Royall, and desired him for a passe, to return unto his Master, beseeching him, for his own glories sake, to do him so much honour as to give him some assurance of the Princess Mandanas life: For truly Sir (said he) knowing already what you have done for her, I have some reason to hope that though you did it not, for the interest of that great Prince unto whom I belong, yet you will give me leave to carry the joyfull news unto him, of your being her Protector. Ariantes being much taken with the boldness of Ortalgues, he received him very well, and very obligingly told him, that he saw Cyrus was every way happy, even in his Domestiques: Afterwards told him, that though Cyrus was both his Enemy and Rivall, yet he would neither be ungrateful nor wicked, but would ever acknowledge the Obligations upon him, since the time he was Anaxarxis, by the assurance he would give him of Mandanas safety, as long as shee was under the Queen his sisters power; and the better to persuade him unto a belief of it, he told him as much as in any handsomenesse he could, what he had done for the preservation of that Princess, he also told him that he might go unto his Master, but to avoid suspicion, the man whom he intended to send with him should go by himselfe.

In the mean time Ortalgues after he understood that the messenger of Thomiris was returned, and understood from Gelonide, the good state of every thing, he departed without rendring the Letters which he took upon him to deliver: But he went in the Massagettan habit, and with an order from Ariantes, least he should Page 11 be stayed by his forces. So as this faithful servant arriving just as the messenger from Ariantes was telling Cyrus that he would come, he overjoyed that Prince when he told him all that Gelonide and Ariantes said unto him; and when he saw Mandanas life was in no danger: So that desiring to share his joyes amongst his dearest freinds, especially unto Mazares, though his Rivall, he sent for him, also for Anacharsis, Artamus, Myrsiles, Intaphames, and Artagatis: yet the three last were very angry their Letters were not delivered, but for all that were very glad to hear that their mistresses were well. In the mean time Cyrus altered the answer which he would give unto Thomiris, yet he did not alter it without serious examination, whether he should build upon Ariantes and Gelonide or no: But when he considered that Ariantes was in love with Mandana, he concluded upon an absolute necessity of believing him, because he was concerned in the life of this Princess, so that being confirmed in this resolution, he told Ariantes messenger, as he dismissed him, and rewarded him with a rich present, that the proceedings of his Master were so generous, that he would for ever esteem him; and did not despair, but hereafter he should be beholding to him, for setting the Princess Mandana at liberty, but in the mean time he conjured him for his own Glories sake, to continue her Protector: and to acquaint him with any thing which may secure the life of that Princess: For truly (said he unto the messenger of his Rivall) I do so highly esteem Ariantes for what he hath done, as if he should send me word, that Mandana were in danger, unlesse I came and assumed the Fetters of Thomiris, I think I should take his word. On the other side, this great Prince charged Chrysantes to tell the Massagettan Queen, that he had more confidence in her virtue, then to fear Mandanas life, and that he was confident of her safety, under her power, nor should he doubt his own, were he under her power also; which if she desire, she must first remit Mandana into the King of Medeas hands, adding, that what she before sent to him, he believed was spoken in the height of her sorrowes: and could never think that she had any bad intentions against the life of that Princess, and therefore he had no more to say, but to crave pardon for not believing her messenger; and to make amends for that fault, he would engage himself by oath, to treat all his Prisoners as well as if they were in his own army. Chrysantes having received these instructions went unto Thomiris, but though Cyrus answered Ariantes by his messenger, yet he would have Feraulus accompany Chrysantes, to deliver his mind unto his Rivall, and so these two faithful servants unto a most illustrious Master, went to acquit themselves of their charges. The answer of Cyrus unto Thomiris being all sweetness, and civility, and shee not knowing how that Prince had been informed of the true state of her soul, either from Ariantes or Gellonide, she was exceedingly joyed, especially because the passion of her soul made her beleieve, that Cyrus was not so much in love with Mandana, as she imagined, since to redeem her, he would not hazard himself: So as this imagination flatt'ring her mind, she received Chrysantes very favorably, and told him, that she belgan to think that Cyrus was not culpable of her Sonns death: adding that shee would indeavoure to cleer him, and if shee found him innocent, he needed not to fear Mandanas life. In the mean time, she hoped ere long to have him in her powder, and within this few dayes to have as great an advantage over him, as he had got over her. But shee having a desire to gain a little time untill her forces were come up, shee propounded unto Chrysantes a cessation; to treat (as shee sayd) con|cerning the liberty of some prisoners, hinting of many things in her discourse which induced him to think, that perhaps she desired this time to consider and overcome her selfe, and to restore Mandana to liberty, so that he parted with promise to acquaint his Master with all she sayd. Feraulus for his, part went unto Ariantes, who gave a very civill answer unto the message of Cyrus, but as cunning as Feraulus was, it was impossible for him to get a sight either of Mandana, Coralisa, or Martesia, yet she saw Gelonide, and shee was as favourable to him as possible. But since the Capitaine of Mandanas guard was more the creature of Ariantes then unto Thomiris the Princesse was most stricktly guarded: yet he understood that they were served with much respect, and that shee had no other trouble but her solitude, and the visits of Ariantes, which were very tedious to her, though he behaved himselfe with as much submission as if he were her slave: But though Feraulus had not leave to see Page 12Mandana, yet he saw the Princesse of Bythinia, the Princess Istrina, and the faire Arpasia, unto whom he presented commendations from Gadotes, Intaphemes, Aterlgates, Gabrias and Hydagres, in whom they had severall concerns. Yet they had not liberty to write; but they charged Feraulus which sayd many things by word of mouth, that he stood in need of a good memory to return them all. The Princess of Bythinia enquired very much concerning the Princess Araminta, being much joyed that Spitridates, would be at the Camp of Cyrus very shortly. But the time of departure being come, Chrysantes pressed Feraulus, to make haste, and so he left them, after he had observed that there was a great intimacy between Serpalcia, and those two Princesses. In the mean time Cyrus followed his first resolution, and marched to the entrance into the wood as soon as Chrysantes was gone; and quatered himself so neer the Enemies Guard, that they had continuall skirmishes, so as it was in that Place where Chrysantes and Feraulus gave an accompt of their voyage. The proposition which Thomiris made, did much perplex Cyrus, for he beleieved it was only to gain time; but Chrysantes thinking he had discovered the thoughts of Thomiris, assured him, that there was something in her mind which would be advantageous to him, if he gave her leasure to surmount her passion. Yet Cyrus for all this, could not resolve upon this truce, but had continued, forcing the passages which the Sauromates guarded, if a certain Ingeneer had not come into his army, who was famous for many admirable secrets. Indeed since this passage was very long, and difficult to be forced, Cyrus had a hard task to attempt it, and since it was likely to weaken his army very much, he gave care unto this Ingineer, who proposed a way to passe these straits, with lesse losse, provided he made a truce for some few dayes, during which time; he could prepare all things necessary for his design. But Cyrus, being unwilling to hazard any thing upon the prudence of others, he would have this Artist first shew him the way which he intended to work. This ingineer thus told him,

That having observed two great passages in the woods which were not above fifteen furlongs from each other; and that they were the only places by which there was any passage, he further perceived that the enemies guarded the one of these much more carefully then the other, and where they had many more men, because they were perswaded that they should be assaulted. Moreover he sayd, that whilst the truce was, when souldiers have liberty to go and come into the Camps, then some of Cyrus souldiers, commanded for that purpose, should seeme to walk in the wood between these passages, and through against all the trees, a certain composition prepared with such art, as it should stick unto any thing it touches, and which hath such a disposition to burn, that the least spark given to the first tree, will set the whole Forrest on fire, provided that there be trees from distance to distance prepared with this composition to receive the fire and communicate it selfe. So Sir (sayd this Ingineer to Cyrus) when trees at their severall distances are prepared with this composition, which will never be discovered, because its of the colour of the bark and mosse, you may make choise of a night when the wind is up, as always it useth after sun set till sun rise, to set fire to the first tree, and to advance towards that passe which is weakest guarded, and in the height of their fears, begin your assault: Those of the one passe dare not passe through the flames, to releive the o|ther. Your men Sir will not be affrighted, because they know the plot; but sayd Cyrus, will not this be as dangerous for us as for our enemies? No Sir (replied the man) For the wind commonly blowing one way at that time of the year, those trees must be prepared only which stand one way, and not that side of the way which you are to take, so as your troops taking the right side, may passe without danger, & will not at all be affrighted as your enemies, but take fresh courage, because the flames do fight for them. Cyrus after this, put severall questions to the man, and would needs see the experiment of this strange composition, whose cheife matteriall was the mud of a lake which is in Comagines, neer a town called Samosate, and which is so gluttinous, that it will stick unto any thing it toucheth; and hath such a naturall disposition to burn and consume that unto which it sticks, that the least spark will make a great blaze, this fire is the most dangerous, because water will not quench it, nor any thing else, but much earth thrown upon it. Thus this Ingineer assured Cyrus, that it had done prodigies, and sayd that Medea made use of it to put Page 13Creuseus to death. This great Prince advised him not to publish so great a secret, least it should put the honesty of many a man to the Test. However, since Cyrus hearkned unto this proposition, at the same time, when Chrysantes told him that Thomiris desired a truce, he was the more willing to hearken unto it, since in lieu of retarding his designs, it would forward them, yet his great heart had some repugnance against all manner of truces in war: But Mazanes did so press him to make use of this invention to shorten the war, that fearing least Mandana should accuse him for being over scrupulous in point of honour, when perhaps her life depended upon it, he resolved upon it: So as calling a Counsell of war about it, it was concluded that he should not deny this truce, and thereupon Cyrus sent Chrysantes to Thomiris, and the peace was concluded for eight dayes, and published in both Camps. Thomiris made many propositions concerning the Officers of her army that were taken prisoners, at the last battle which she lost: Also to delude the people and make them beleive that her passion was not the cause of the War, she made some propositions of peace, which truly were not altogether unreasonable, except in that she demanded Mandana to stay three years in her Court as as hostage. In the mean time Cyrus desired Anacharsis, to go unto Thomiris and tell her, that he could not give any direct answer, unlesse she would permit him to see Mandana, and know from her own mouth whether she would consent unto his propositions: But do what Anacharsis could, she would not permit that; So as all the eight daies were spent in frivolous negotiations: Yet there was an uncertain kind of a hope that there would be a change in the heart of Thomiris, and the rather, because that Queen prompted by her passion, desired to treat with Cyrus himselfe, in a fancy that her presence might perhaps move the heart of the Prince, who not daring to refuse this interview, though it went against his mind, desired that he might speak with Ariantes, though they would not let him speak with Mandana, doubtless Cyrus had no mind to see Thomiris, nor did Ariantes desire the sight of Cyrus: But their interests were so odly mixt, that neither of them durst deny the motion. Thus they prepared themselves for these severall interviews; which was resolved to be in the midst of the wood between both armies. Atergates and Intaphemes demanded to see the Princesse of Bythinia, and the Princesse Istrina: Hidaspes and Gabrias demanded to see the fair Arpasia: but though their demands were no lesse just then the other, yet Thomiris refused them, but it was at the instance of Lycander: So that the fair Arpasia had the sorrowes, not to see either her father or her Lover, so that she grieved most extremely at it.

The Princesse of Bithinia and the Princesse Istrina, who did infinitely esteem her, did indeavour to comfort her, and offered her to tell those two Princes, whom they were to see within a day or two, whatsoever shee would please to have them know: And certainly these two Princes had good reason to interest themselves in behalf of Arpasia, who questionlesse was no ordnary person. She was big and tall, though her Grandure was no more then so much as to please. Her hair was a lovely dark brown as ever was seen, and was so apt to curl, that the least whiffle of wind did turne it into handsomer rings then any art could do. The modell of Arpasias face was ovall, she had gray, full, and passionate eyes, and the corners of her mouth had such a particular kind of smile, that it was enough to see the lower part of her face, and to know her, her lips were so even and persect carnation, that her beauty was so incomparable, her cheeks were so pleasingly round, and had such an amiable fresh plumpnesse, that though the complexion of Arpasia was not of the clearest luster, yet was she a great beauty, because there was an exact uniformity in every part, tis true, her nose had not so much regularity as the rest of her face, yet it was not so, as did blast the rest of her feature, and if it were any defect, it served as a foyl to set the rest of her excellings better off, who besides all these, halving most pure white teeth, and faire neck and armes, was doubtlesse one of the most charming Ladies of the world; her Garb was so high, her aire so noble, and her walking agreeable, that none could look on her, without a disposition to love her. She danced with as good a grace as shee walked, and had such a nature of mirth and gravity together, as did infinitely please: her humour was as charming as her beauty, for shee was alwayes sweet, civill, and affable she had a good inclination to Rallary, or at least to love those who did it well, but she gave a check un|to Page 14her inclination, and commonly seemed more grave then merry: Yet notwithstanding she loved pleasures, especially company, and company a little gallant, she could not spend a whole afternoon with one freind in private without being weary, for shee had a kind of active spirit which was an enemy to all Impishnesse, and which made all shee did delightfull. Moreover, shee was naturally magnificent, liberal, and good, and had a soul so tender, as would make one almost assured not to be hated, though one should tell her that they were in love with her, yet she was not capable of any violent passion, & the pleasure of being loved made her sometimes suffer her self to be so, rather then out of any real inclination. She was not at all fantastick, & that desire to please which was in her heart, proceeded from a more further noble cause. Furthermore, shee had a witt so sharp, and shee could so cunningly pompe the minds of those, whose designs shee desired to know, as it may be said shee had a key to open their hearts, and look into their secrets; and all this without any seeming of subtiltie: indeed her temper was so opposite unto any guile, that shee never had any freind whom shee once deceived: but was apt to a kind of generous confidence which had rather be exposed to be deceived by others, then to be so subtle as to prevent being deceived. This Arpasia with her Beauty, Wit, and goodness, did so please the Princesse of Bythinia, and the Princesse Istrina, that they were desirous to know her adventures, especially since shee would imply them in some businesse unto those Princes whom they were to see; For truly (said Istrina to her, after much other discourse) It is not possible wee should be able to do you any right service, unlesse we do know the state of your misfortunes. They are of such a nature (replied shee) that I can expect no advantage from you by telling of them, but only your pity. Though you cannot Madam, replied the Princesse of Bithinia, yet I beseech you tel them unto us, for truly as for my part, I do finde great ease unto my miseries, by being pittied. Doubtless its true Madam, (replied Arpasia) But I am so unable to relate all the accidentes of my life my self, that if you would know them, it must be from her who has a share in my misfortunes, for besides her knowing of them as well as my selfe, I cannot relate such things with any order, which have so much disordered my mind. I know tis said that the remembrance of miseries is sweet: but I must be happy first before I can take any delight in remem|bring my past misfortunes: And therefore since I am not in that condition, I beseech you dispense with me. We shall willingly dispense with you Madam (replied the Princesse of Bithinia) provided the amiable Niside who is with you, will undertake it in your room. I am contented, answered Arpasia; then I beseech you (said Istrina) let it be this day: for since we do not directly know when wee shall goe and see those Princes, unto whom you will imploy us: It is requisit we should be knowing in the state of your fortune as soon as you can. To testifie how willing I am to discover my misfortunes unto you (answered shee) I will go unto Niside and give her orders to acquaint you with all my weaknesses: shee is a woman whose hard fortune cannot deject, by dejecting her house and familie; and who has such a share in all that relates unto me that shee knowes all my thoughts: And therefore you may give credit unto all that shee will say, excepting in any commendations which perhaps shee will give me: For happily her friendship to me may byasse her. When wee have heard her, replied the Princesse of Bithinia, wee shall give you all justice, and shall beleieve as wee ought to doe. After this Arpasia retired, and Niside stayed with the Princesses, asking them pardon before hand for her want of any art to relate what they required; Then after many civilities, they pressed her to begin the relation, which she did in these termes, addressing her speech unto the Princesse of Bithinia.

THE HISTORY OF ARPASIA.

Though I am perswaded, you have so good an opinion of Arpasias judgment, as to think, that she would never have comamnded me to relate her adventures, if she had not known that I was able to make a perfect relation of things past; yet I must tell you, Madam, that none upon earth knows them better then I do, and I dare allmost say, that I know them better then her self. For the truth is, that the heavy burthen of her sorrowes, hath hindred her from observance of mainy which I have seen with lesse trouble, though I was ever a sharer in all her miseries: For fortune having ruin'd the family from which I descended, which heretofore kept my self in a good rank, and having lost those who gave me life, when I was very young, I was put unto Arpasia, as having the honour to be allied unto her, by my Mother. And having continued with this excellent Lady ever since my infancy, I have not only seen her adventures with my own eyes, but further, I have known her most secret thoughts. I shall not trouble you Madam with a relation of Arpasia's birth: For you are not ignorant that Gabrias her Father hath a little Dominion, which depends only upon the Gods and himselfe; and that Gadates and he were two Grantees, who heretofore pretended to marry Nitocris. Nor shall I aggrivate the miseries of the fair Arpasia, which began by the death of her elder Brother, who dyed after so sad a manner at Babylon, by the violence of the late King of Assyria, that it is not possible that you should know it, and Arpasia was then so young, that she was not capable of any long sorrowes for it. But Madam, it is requisite you know, that Gabrias, even since the losse of his Son, did wholly decline the interests of the Assyrian Prince. Yet he did conceal his Resentments, out of his Respects unto the Queen Nitocris, who then lived: But as soon as she was dead, and that Prince had brought the Princesse Mandana to Babylon, his desire of revenge began to break out, and his whole imaginations were how to ruine the Assyrian King. And to that end, he did not only enter into league with all his neighbour Princes against him, but also united himselfe with all the Malecontents of that Court. But Madam, before I go any further, I must tell you, that Gabrias having lost his Wife as well as his Son, did set his whole affection upon the amiable Arpasia, and she was then upon her 15 year, and he loved her the more, because he looked upon her as a person who would contribute unto that revenge which he would take upon the King of Assyria, as afterwards I shall tell you in the sequell of my discourse. In the mean time be pleased to know, that there was a Governour of a Province which belonged to that King, who knowing that he loved him not, and that he would certainly take his government from him, he sought an occasion to revolt; so that not being ignorant, that Gabrias had cause of complaint, he sent a Nephew of his to him purposely to sound him, and he sent him presently after the death of Nitocris. But Madam, since he of whom I speak whose name was Astidamus was the cheife cause of all Arpasia's miseries, it is requisite I make a description of him unto you, as he was when he came to the town where Gabrias did most commonly reside, and where Artasia did infinitely delight, and to tell you truly, it was not without cause. For it was exceedingly pleasant both in its situation and the country about it, and also in respect of a stately Castle which was its principall strength. Moreover, though this little Court had no great tumults, and thro'ging, Page 16 yet was it very agreeable and delightfull, and hugely pleased Astidamus as soon as he saw it: But to describe him as I intended, I must say he was of a mean stature, but handsome and well made, his hayr and eyes black, and without either extraordinary handsomeness or ugliness. It may be said, he was possible enough, especially because he knew the mode of the world, and a free merry way which much pleased. Moreover, he was rich and handsome in his cloathes, and he knew so well how to suit and fit himself, that he was never seen in ill sorted colours. Moreover, his company was good and pleasing, and he had such a kind of way with him, that he did not need to strive for excellent things to please; for his manner of way and aire, in speaking the most commune things, did make them pass for excellent. Yet he was a man better at generall conversation then private discourse, for having a kind of a merry unquietness of spirit, which made him perpetually pass from object, to object; he could not indure to talk long upon one thing, or to one person: So as the greater the company, the merrier was he. He danced with a good grace, and for a man of his quality, sung passing well; Now Madam, after all the good qualities of Astidamus, give me leave to tel his bad ones, and acquaint you that his manners were not very innocent. In point of valour, he could not be questioned, but he had a most voluptuous soul; and took his pleasure in such an odd way, as one could not know him and love him. As for his matter of love, it was something particular, for sometimes he would seem inconstant, and sometimes deeply in love, yet to define him rightly, he more desired to be loved, than he loved those who loved him though upon some occasions, he hath seemed really to love.

Truth is, Some things he did, are attributed to that passion which ought not to be so. For if he had a mind to do a thing, he would go through with it at any rate, not for any love to the thing it self, but because he had undertaken it, yet he appeared very civill, affable, and ready to court the first Lady that he met, in the way of gallantry, Astidamus being such a one as I have described, did come, as I told you from his Uncle to sound the depth of Gabrias and his thoughts, and to move him unto some attempts against the now King of Assyria, so as he was received with much joy and magnificence. He commanded Arpasia, to shew him all the Ladyes of her acquaintance, yet there was no great assemblies, by reason of the Queens death: But they often walked & sometimes hunted, and only common pleasures were the diversions. At the first all the Ladyes, liked Astidamus, except Arpasia, for whether she sooner found out his ill qualities than the rest, or whither it was out of a naturall aversion to him, she was fain to force her selfe unto a commendation of him, yet this did not then appear, for knowing the mind of her Father, she shewed all imaginable civility to Astidamus. As for him he seemed to be so taken with the beauty of this excellent Lady, with her wit and merit, that none made any question but that he was in love with her: And Arpasia her self thought so as well as the rest, and though she entertained not one thought which was advantageous to him, she saw this growing passion without giving any check,

For first, she could not foresee that his love could prejudice her, since she was to be gone within a few dayes.

And secondly; Her age might well excuse her, for she was not sorry for making any new conquest.

Thus Arpasia not repulsing Astidamus, nor seeming to take notice of his passion, did go very civilly towards him, and he being apt to flatter himself with hope, he was a Lover without any misery, though he had no reason to hope for any happiness.

However, all the world talked of Astidamus love unto Arpasia; And I think others spoke of it more then he himself did, and they talked so much of it, that the made use of these reports, to discover his affection unto Arpasia; and indeed he did it very gallantly, and in a particular manner, though she was a little sharp with him. He chanced to be there one day when all the company did separate themselves into couples, and it was Astidamus his good fortune to talk with Arpasia. And closing with this opportunity, he fell into talk with her, and commended her, knowing very well that commendation is the best preparative, to make a Mistresse receive a declaration of love favourably. But since Arpasia would needs out of modesty change the discourse, least she should go further then she desired: and after Page 17 she handsomly defended her self against her flatteries, she observed, how chance had brought so many thither, as made even couples, two and two. But that which I most admire at (added she) is, that every one of these couples hath some privacies together, and that fortune should so well place them, as that they may talke in secret together. I wish with all my heart Madam (sayd Astidamus, who heard two Ladies next him talk of his passion to Arpasia) that after your admiration as what Fortune hath done, you knew what every one in the company sayes, and that you would command them to tell you presently: I assure you Sir, replied she, that if they have any humours to satisfie my curiosity they would do me a great pleasure in it. And me more then you Madam (replied he) not that I think you to be of a more inquisitive nature then I am; but I can easily guess by their faces what they talk of, and think that it is upon something which you desire to know, I profess Astidamus, replied she, you are very excellent at the science of conjectures and since you can tell what people do say when they speak low, I pray tell me. To shew you that, I am not much mistaken (replied he) I will tell you what those two Ladyes next me did say, and afterwards you shall ask them whether I was far off the mark or not; I will (answered she) But it shall be upon condition, that if you fail in your guesses you shall never meddle with Divination again, I will willingly ingage my self (replied he) because I am sure, that I am not mistaken. Then tell me replied she, what those two Ladyes sayd, they sayd Madam, (answered he and looked stedfastly upon her) that I am desperately in love with you, and therefore you need not think it strange, that I should guess what they say, as well as they guess what I have most truly thought: Fie Astidamus (replied Arpasia and blusht) you are a very bad Diviner, and so are those Ladyes also, if they do think as you say: I beseech you Madam (replied he) let me desire them to confess what they sayd, and what they thought: As for the last of these (replied she) it will be a hard matter for you to make them confess it, and as for the other, it is to no purpose. Provided Madam sayd he, you will beleive me upon my word, I shal I not need the testimonies of those Ladyes; but if you will not, I must intreat all those who talk of my love, to talk of it unto you, as they do unto others, And I beseech you Madam, be no more offended at me, and to what I shall say, than you will be at them when they say any thing unto you. Your language (replied she) will passe for such a pleasant peice of railly, that I shall not take it seriously. Provided Madam, answered he, that you will think my Railly to be really true, you may let it passe for what you please. If I should thinke so, (replied Arpasia) it would be so little advantageous to you as you had better not desire it: however I do professe that I doe not love such aillarie. And if I thought you had any intention to use it any more, I would never talke in private with you as long as I lived. This is extreame unjust Madam (said he unto her) that you should suffer all the world to tell you that I doe love you, and not to allow me, who knowes the truth of it better than they, I assure you (replied shee) none ever told me that you were in love with me; or if they had, it had been no great pleasure to me. Then am very unhappie (replied he for ever since there were any Ladies I am confident non would be ever offended when they were told that they had made a new conquest, though they will seem angry when they are told of it: and it is a most horrible Injustice in all women. Since I am not of your opinion I shall (replied she aloud purposely to make the company generall) desire all the company to Judge whether it be Just in you to condemn all Ladies as you do; Every one hearing what Arpasia said, broke of their private conferences, and began to harken unto her, and aske what the Injustice of Astidamus was? hee confidently affirms (said shee,) that all women are well pleased when they are told of any new conquest they have made. You Madam were ever so Just (replied one of those Ladies to whom shee spoke whose name was Stenobira) that I am sure to be on the right side, if I be on yours; you are so able your selfe Madam to maintaine an ill cause (added another of the Ladies) as you are able to vanquish Astidamus without any assistance of mine. For my part (said a man of qualitie called Tirimenes) I do conceive the complaint which Astidamus makes of Ladies is so reasonable, that I have a thousand times murmured against their injustice: truth is, said Astidamus, to speake in generall all women are unjust in making men to love them, and not let them speake of it to them: But if any Lady have any reason to take it ill from a man who is in love with her, to tell her of it; Page 18 shee hath much more reason to take it ill from men who are not in love with her, to talk other conquests; yet custom hath made this Injustice almost a Law, and one may tell a woman shee ever makes all men miserable; that her eyes kindle fire in the hearts of men; that some are ready to dye for her, & such like; In the mean time if a man do but open his mouth and tell her that he loves her, she is ready to banish him, to treat him ill; to impose eternall silence, and to threaten everlasting hatred. This rule is not so generall as you imagine (replied Stenobira and smiled) for I doe know some weomen, who will be more angry with a freind for chiding them, for making any in love with them, than they will be with their Lovers for telling them they are in love: tis true, it happens so sometimes (sayd Terimone) but you never heard of it; but when a Lady hath contracted amity with him who is so plain with her, so that her anger is not caused by any excesse of severitie: Tirimenes is in the right (said Astidamus) but I cannot endure that they who suffer themselves to be told a 1000. times in the year that this man is in love with them, & that man is in love with them; yet will not suffer him who adores them, to tel them so much as once how many miserieshe endures for their sakes, if there be any reformation to be made in the custom (replied Arpasia sharply) doubtless it is to be only in this, that weomen should never harken unto their lovers, nor let their freinds chide them for making any in love with them. Not but that women might hear men without any anger if they would leave off all flatteries: but when they will be talking of such things as they them[selves] do know ought not to be hearkned unto, their anger in that case hath a most just ground. Madam replied Astidamus, you defend a bad cause, with so much wit, that as long as you are speaking, I am ready to submit unto your arguments but as soon as ever you are silent, I returne unto my first opinion, and declare, that if it be a crime to make men in love with you, than you have no reason to take it well that your freinds do tell you of it: but if it be not, than you may very well permit him whom you have captivated, to tell you of it as well as others: For there is no Justice that those who endure no torments nor inquietudes from the passion they speak of, should have liberty to speak of it unto you: Whilst those who suffer most miserable tortures, are not permitted to complain and tell where their pain doth lie. For my particular (replied Arpasia and blushed) I have no concernment in this dispute: For I am none of those who use to hearken unto their Lovers with delight or who are angry with their friends, nor do I remember that any ever told me, any was in love with me. Fie Madam (replied Stenobira) who knew nothing of the passages between Astidamus and Arpasia) you are not now sincere: For I have told you that I do know some men, whom your beauty hath tormented. Then is my memoiry very bad (replied shee faintly) But if that be true and that I may make some profit of what Astidamus hath said, I must be angry with you and truly Stenobira, I could easily be so, if I could believe you. After this, Arpasia making a motion to walk, the conversation changed, and during the walk these two Ladies being next Astidamus, he over-heard what they said, and how Stenobira told Arpasia that Astidamus was in love with her: however Arpasia having a natural aversion to him, she was as much vexed to think that Astidamus should love her, as she would have been to hear that one whom she loved had hated her. But to exasperate her aversion it was discovered that at the very same time he seemed to be in love with her, he also was very frequent with another Lady of quality who was very fair, but of so bad a carriage, that such as were any thing cautious of their reputation, never frequented her. So that Arpasia extremely disliking all such as could carry themselves equally compliant unto all women, so they were fair: she conceived such a kind of aversion towards Astidamus as did very nearly resemble hatred, so that if she had not been full of respects unto her Father, she could not have concealed it. But Astidamus being most agreeable unto all such as did not perfectly know him, most of the Ladies did much esteem him. At last, Astidamus after he had been a month with Gabrias he returned to his uncle, who looked upon him as his son, since he had no children, and he returned without any reason of much commending, or much complaining against Arpasia: For she carried her self with so much prudence out of feare to anger her father, that her aversion to Astidamus did not appear so much as unto me, whom shee was pleased to honour as her Confident. Some dayes after his returne to Alfenes, there came a messenger from Protogenes, the Uncle of Astidamus; and for many dayes together it was understood that Gabrias sent unto Protogenes and Protogenes unto Gabrias yet none did wonder at it. For since the carrying away of Page 19 the Princess Mandana had then put all Asia into an universall disorder: And since the death of the Queen Nitocris had wrought a great change in the minds of all such as were tyed to the interests of the Assyrian King, it was conceived, that every one thinking of their own safety; & examining which side to take in a war which was apparently fore seen, that there was some negotiation between Gabrias and Protogenes, yet the secret of the affair was not seen, but ere it was long, we found it out: For Madam be pleased to know that Gabrias having treated with Protogenes purposely to be revenged upon the king of Assyria, they both resolved to take part with Cyrus but not to declare themselves until that Prince had an army in the field, and was advancing towards Babylon, as it was likely he would. But that their interests might be the more united, & their treaty more solidly made, a marriage between Arpasia & Astidamus was resolved upon. So that one morning, when this fair one little dreamed of it, Gabrias came to tell her that she must prepare her self to go unto Alfenes & within eight dayes to marry him. You may imagine Madam, how sad Arpasia was at this news: but since she stood in fear of Gabrias, she durst not let the horrid Antipathy between the marriage & her appear: knowing very well that if she did shew her aversion it was to no purpose: For her Father would not breake a treaty of that nature, though she should employ all her tears to win him unto it: So as forcing her self with a strange violence to conceal the excess of her sorrowes, she told her Father, that she was all obedience, but she told him it with so much sadness as betrayd her heart, & let him know more than she would have shewed, yet notwithstanding Gabrias being too deeply engaged in his designs of revenge, would not take any notice of her repugnancy: But gave all requisite orders that the voyage should be very magnificent. For since he desired to cloak the league from all suspicion; he published the marriage of his daughter with Astidamus, purposely because none should wonder at his going unto Alfenes, nor beleive that it was to confer with Protogenes. So that the marriage of his daughter being the pretext of his voyage, the preparations for it were with all magnificence & noise; and Arpasia was constrained to receive the visits of all those who came to rejoyce with her, for a thing which was the saddest news in the world unto her, so that standing in need of all her patience she was forced to ease her heart unto me, and complain against the rigor of her fortune. In the mean time, as the state of affairs stood, they required all haste in the business, and all things requisite for the voyage were in readynesse; & we departed sooner then wee expected: Almost all the young gallants of any note about Gabrias did wait upon him; and this little Court Errant (that I may phrase it) had been very pleasant, if the heart of Arpasia had not been so full of secret sorrowes; she was also obliged by her Fathers command to answer a Letter which Astidamus sent her; and to answer it with all the civility of a person who looked upon him as her husband, though truly the letter which shee received from him was none of the most obliging, the letter yet was well written and full of wit: Every word was full of civility and respect, and yet so couched that they were not at all obliging: For there was such a kind of faint luke-warmnes in it as made it neither tender nor passionate, but as if it were written by a man who was not in love, only writ a love letter, because he was obliged, or forced unto it.

You may easily imagin what kind of discourse Arpasia, and I had, during this voyage and she would have none in the Coach with her, but only me, purposely to have the liberty of talke; and pretending the heat of the weather, she sent all her other women into other Coaches. she, and I were a whole day together, talking of nothing but her misfortune: and the neerer we drew unto Alfenes, the more her melancholly increased. So that being within two dayes journey, she seemed as if she were nothing but a lump of sadness. Yet she had the comfort to understand that Gabrias would stay some dayes at a town by the way; until he were better satisfied from Protogenes, in some points concerning the treaty, which he would have ended by negotiation before he advanced any further. Yet we were ignorant of the true cause of this stay; but Gabrias told his Daughter, that the reason of it was, because all things for her magnificent reception were not yet in readinesse. However it was, Arpasia was glad of the stop, though she was sorry to be so neere a place where she was to be miserable. But Madam, it is requisite I acquaint you with a passage which hapned that day when we were so sad, before we came to the town where we were to stay; neere unto which there was a River, over which there was a bridge only of planks for foot people, but not for coaches, because Page 20 it was too weak and narrow: We understood also from some Country people, that the Ford over which the Coach was to pass, was much obstructed by rubbish which a flood had brought with it: and was very dangerous until it was a little scoured; so that we came out of the Coach to go over this foot bridge: Gabrias going himself to see whether the men sayd true, we stayed a long time upon this bridge, beyond which, we espied a man of a most admirable presence walking on the other side of this River, and who assoon as we stayed, stopped and looked upon us also. Arpasias mind being full of melancholly, she no sooner saw this handsome stranger, but imagining him to be some friend unto Astidamus whom he had sent unto her Father, she changed her colour, and turning towards me: Alas Niside, (sayd she unto me) I should be very sorry if this stranger, who seems to be so handsome, should prove a messenger from Astidamus: For I must confess my aversion to him is such, as I wish him only to have fools unto his friends, and I wish my self such a one for his sake; that he may have a wife worthy of himself: Your wish, Madam, is so unjust, (sayd I unto her) and the execution of it so impossible, that you make it altogether in vain: But as for this stranger, there is no likelihood that he should be any friend unto Astidamus: For if he were, he would advance; and I am confident that he stays only to have the pleasure of seeing you at a neerer distance when you have passed the bridge: For as we can discern him to be very handsome, so may he discern enough in you to invite his looks, and perhaps (sayd I unto her laughing, purposely to drive her out of her melancholly) if he look upon you but one quarter of an hour longer, he will become a Rivall unto Astidamus: At least his Garb speaks his condition to be worthy of it. I wish with all my heart he were (replied Arpasia suddenly) and I wish this man, who ere he be, were so far in love with me, as to prevent the designs of Astidamus, upon condition that I should not love him so much my self as to disturb the quiet of my life. I had thought Madam (sayd I unto her) that your hatred to Astidamus was so great, as that you would have gone on with your wish without any condition; and that you would rather have been the Lover of this stranger, than the wife of the other: Truly, (replied she) if there were any possibility in the proposition, I should be strangely perplexed if it should be made unto me; for I would do almost any thing in the world to keep me from marrying Astidamus: As we were talking thus, I saw that this stranger looked upon Arpasia very earnestly, & coming insensibly neere the end of the bridge, where he thought she would pass, he seemed as if he liked her a far off, and desired to see her neerer; so that we continued talking of him, until we came out of the Coach, to pass over the bridge. But Madam, the prospect being admirably good, especially when we were upon the midst of the bridge, Arpasia stayed a long time there to delight her self with so fair an Object; thinking that she deferred her miseries some munits, in not making any hast over. Indeed, the place was very delectable: One side of the River looked towards the ruins of a stately Castle, which set limits to the eye that way: On the other side, the river did so turn and wind it self through a great and pleasant meadow, that one would have thought there had been five or sixe severall Rivers in one place: But that which rendred the prospect most delightful, was a rank of mountains beyond the meadows, which riding upon the back of each other, seemed to reach the Clouds, and barracado up the Country that way: On the other side, towards the town, which stood neere this little River, the eye was unlimited, but pleasingly invited to look upon severall plumps of wood, many pretty hamlets, abundance of Shepherds Cottages, millions of flocks and herds wherewith the plains were covered, so as Arpasia standing in the midst of this bridge and viewing these rustick beauties, she stayed there, as I told you before; and she stayed the longer, because a cloud having masked the Sun, she might do it without any inconveniency: So as by this means, the stranger who stood at the end of the bridge had time enough to admire her beauty, who being unmasked appeared fairer than ever I saw her before: She being a little hot, her complexion was higher than ordinary, and the winds whiffing her hair negligently, she often ordred it with her fair hands, so as this stranger might see both them, and her arms incomparably white.

But after a long survey of this beautiful prospect, Arpasia passed the bridge, the stranger never taking his eyes off her, for I confesse to you Madam, that I eyed him Page 21 as much as he did Arpasia, though out of a different reason: For I looked upon him, only because his admiration at her beauty pleased me, and he looked upon her doubtless, because he found her the fairest peice, that ever he had seen in his life. However, as soon as Arpasia came neere him, he very respectfully saluted her; and did his complement so handsomly as it was easy to perceive that he was a man of quality, and one who had seen the world. But after Arpasia had passed the bridge, she sat down upon a pillar, which time had tumbled down, and half sunk into the earth, since it first fell, and there she did sit until her Coach had found out a more convenient ford, and came unto her: All the men went over on horse-back with Gabrias, and went with him to the town which was close by, and two or three only staying with Arpasia, she began to talk of severall things: All this while the stranger staying in the same place with his friend, he still looked upon her, as if he had a great desire to come neere her: And indeed, fortune favoured his design; for Arpasia being naturally of an inquisitive disposition, she inquired of every thing that was deserving it, and wondred to see such a goodly pillar as that whereon she sat, in a place where she saw no ruins of any building: For the old defaced Castle which was one of the beauties of the Country was a great distance of it. So that she sent one of her servants to enquire of two men who were neere this stranger, for what use this stately pillar had been? But the two men being only Merchants, they knew nothing of it; but answered they were ignorant, yet the curiosity of Arpasia was fully satisfied, for since they were neere this stranger, he heard what was asked them and what they answered. So then he being very glad of an occasion to talk with one whose beauty he so much admired, he told Arpasias Officer that he would come and satisfie her curiosity, and after he had asked her name and quality, he addressed himself very respectfully unto her.

Madam (sayd he unto her) I think my self very happy in being yesterday so inquisitive as to satisfie my self in what you desire to know, because I shall this day have the glory of satisfying the curiosity of the greatest beauty in the World. Sir, said she and rose up to salute him, I do so little deserve the commendations which you bestow upon me, that I cannot choose but think you to be a flatterer, at least I can see so much in the river as I passe, as makes me blush at the applause which you are pleased to give me: But noble stranger, (sayd she and gave him not so much time as to reply) since you know the meaning of this stately column whose destiny is so much changed, I beseech you inform me; I thought to have told you Madam, replied he, that the destiny of this pillar is much greater than perhaps you imagin, for it is a memoriall of the victories of the great Sesostris, who heretofore made greater conquests then ever any of his predecessors did, and whose custome was to erect such columns in the Countreys where he obtained his victories, and to engrave not only his name and country, but to insculp the valour or the cowardize of those he vanquished: Thus was he wont to eternize the shame, or the glory of his enemies, according as they did more or less, withstand his valour, by erecting such columns as here you see and sit upon: He made also other statues of himself, for two of them are to be seen hewed out of most admirable stone; one of them stands in the way between Ephesus and Phoeceus, and the other between Sardis and Smirna: But as old time is the ruin of all things successively, so this pillar hath less resisted its fading stroke, than those statues, which are yet very fresh; howeever Madam (added he most gallantly) the happy fate of this column hath not abandoned it; for since it hath the honour to serve you for a seat, it hath deserved a fresh erection, to the end also, none other should profane it, by sitting upon it after you: And I know not, (added he and smiled) whether if your conquests were also ingrav'd upon it, they would not appear to be greater than those of Sesostriſ. Had you reſerv'd this laſt peice of flattery, Sir (reply'd ſhe) I ſhould have told you that I am very ſorry for meeting with ſo nobly accompliſh'd a man as you are, becauſe I am ſo ſoon to part from him; but now I muſt tell you, that I think my ſelf happy in parting ſo ſoon, leaſt I ſhould have loſt that right opinion which I have of my ſelf. However I give you many thanks Sir for the favours you have done me, in ſatisfying my curioſity. After this, Arpaſia looking better upon the Pillar, ſhe found an old inſcription, which this ſtranger did interpret, and ſo neatly, as it was ap[ar]ant, he was a man of an excellent wit: And Arpaſia being deſirous to teſtify the Page 22 good opinion ſhe conceiv'd of him, ſhe aſk'd him, who he was, in a very obliging manner, It would ſeem very ſtrange Sir, (ſaid ſhe unto him) if I ſhould be inquiſitive concerning this Column and not be as full of curioſity to know the man who hath ſo well inform'd me, of what country he is, and of what name, and therefore I beſeech you acquaint me with both: Madam (reply'd he very modeſtly) I have done ſo little honour unto the country which gave me birth, that I be[se]ech you give me leave to ſtay untill I have well deſerv'd from it, before I make it known unto you: And let it ſuffice to acquaint you Madam, that men call me Meliantes without any further knowledge of my Country. Be your Country what it will Sir, reply'd ſhe, you deſerve much commendation, and though I have known you but one poor quarter of an hour only, yet I am ſure I ſhall never ſpeak of you but ſhall applaud you. As Arpaſia ſaid ſo, her Coach came up, and Meliantes having answered as one who had ſome reaſon not to deſcribe his country, ſhe urg'd him no further. But Meliantes underſtanding that ſhe was to ſtay in the town, he begg'd the honour to viſit her, and ſhe was willing to ſatiſfie his deſire; ſo that parting very civilly from Meliantes, ſhe took Coach, and I with her. But Madam, all the way to the town we talk'd of nothing but Meliantes and commend'd his Be[ha]viour, his Garb, his Aire, and his Spirit. Alſo I underſtood ſince, that all the reſt of that day he talk'd of nothing unto his companion, but of Arpaſias beauty, and after he had a long time talk'd and walk'd by the river ſide, he return'd to the Town, with his friend, and return'd thither with intentions to enquire more parti[cu]larly of the cauſe of Gabrias his voyage; and indeed he met with a fit opportunity as I ſhall tell you afterwards. On the other ſide, Arpaſia was ſo hugely ſatisfi'd with Meliantes that ſhe told her Father whom ſhe had met withall, relating how he had inform'd her concerning the pillar of Sesostriſ: Alſo ſhe enquir'd of the man at whoſe houſe ſhe lodg'd, whether he knew ſuch a ſtranger as ſhe deſcrib'd, but he answer'd that he knew him not, further than that, he had been three dayes in the town, & that he ſeem'd to be a man of very good rank adding that the next morning after he came, he ſent a ſervant ſome whither, and ſince that, he did nothing but walk continually with his friend and enquire very particularly concerning the Country. But Madam, whiſt Arpaſia was enquiring concerning Meliantes, Meliantes was alſo enquiring very diligently concerning Arpaſia, and fell in with a ſervant of Gabrias, whom he met in a great plain before the Temple of that town: for ſince all ſtrangers have a particular right to fall into diſcourſe when they meet in a country, in which they are equally ſtrangers, it was an eaſy matter for Meliantes to fall into diſcourſe with this ſervant, who naturally lov'd to talk, and who told him more than ever Meliantes aſk'd: For he did not only acquaint him, that Gabrijas was going unto Alfenes; but he told him alſo, that he was going to marry his Daughter unto Aſtidamus: Further, hinting to him that Arpaſia did not love him, nor was pleas'd with the marriage, and out of his exceſſive zeal to Arpaſia, to juſtify her averſion, he acquaint'd him with the irregular demeanour of Aſtidamus. Thus Meliantes did as perfectly know the ſtate of Arpaſias fortune, as if he had known her from her Cradle: And underſtanding that Gabrias would ſtay ſome dayes in that place, he intended to viſit him the next morning; & accordingly did ſo with his friend whoſe name was Phormion. Since Arpaſia had ſpoke very advantageouſly of Meliantes unto her father, hee entertain'd him very civilly: and his perſon was ſo fit to pleaſe, and his way was every way ſo noble, that he got a good opinion at the very firſt ſight: For he was bigge; of a noble ſtature; and of an admirable deportment.

Moreover his haire was cheſt nut colour, his face ſomething long his eyes brown: Teeth white, mouth handſom, and his phyſiognomy ſo ingenious, that it ſpoke him witty before he ſpoke: yet he ſpoke moſt excellently well though his accent was ſom[eth]ing different from ours: and though Meliantes was already knowing in ſo many ſeverall things as it was a wonder conſidering his age, how he ſhould attain unto it; yet his converſation, was naturall and eaſy: and ſpoke with ſuch facilitie, that one might ſee he ſpoke no more than what he knew, though he ſpoke of every thing: at leaſt I am ſure, I never heard him ſpeak any thing which I would have unſaid again, alſo he compos'd verſe excellently, and writ admirable proſe; he had a quick fancy, a ſparkling witt, A pleaſant humour; a noble heart, and moſt generous inclinations Page 23 he courted all perſons of any extraordinary merit with a ſtrange deſire of acquaintance: and could ſo finely inſinuate himſelf into their ſpirits, that they no ſooner were acquainted with him, but he got their eſteem and affection: All that knew him, knew him to have a moſt tender heart, and paſſionate ſoul: And when he had any deſigne to oblige any one, he uſed ſuch expreſſions, as when he ſpoke of friendſhip, one would have thought, he ſpoke of love.

Meliantes then being thus amiable did exceedingly pleaſe Gabrias, who deſired his company as long as he ſtayed in that place; he would by all means have him at dinner with his friend Phormion, who without all doubt was a man of much merit: and to compleat his good fortune, Gabrias deſired him to viſit Arpaſia, who din'd that day in private: and Meliantes willingly obeying where his own inclination invit'd him, he went unto Arpaſias chamber, who was glad to ſee him. Since they had already ſo much eſteem of each other, as to deſire an augmentation of it, it ſeem'd by their converſation, that they had no deſignes to conceal their wits; & they ſhew'd them without any affectation: their diſcourſe were ſo pleaſing & diverting that all the company had ſhares in their joyes of confirming that eſteem which they had of each other. The principal ſubject of their converſings was that univerſall chain of all things in the world; which if one linke be but chang'd a hundred thouſand linkes will change alſo. For truly (ſaid Arpaſia unto Meliantes very ſweetly) if Sesostriſ had never paſſed out of Africa into Asia, perhaps I ſhould never have ſpoke to you: For then he had never erect'd that pillar upon which I ſate, which was the commencement of our acquaintance: and if old time had not defac'd it, I ſhould never have known you; for had the inſcription bin faire, my father would have underſto'd it, and I ſhould not have had any need of you. So that I am a debtor unto two very different things, for the pleaſure which I have in your company Firſt unto that illuſtrious conqueror, who erect'd that Columne. Secondly to time, which did ruin it, and which made me ſtand in need of your help to ſatiſfie my curioſitie. I beſeech you Madam (ſaid Meliantes and ſmiled) remember what you ſay, that if ever my acquaintance ſhould become troubleſome to you, you may ſtill accuſe Sesostriſ and not me: And I ſhould be very glad you ſhould think, there is a fatal neceſſitie upon all things in the world, to the end you may complain a[ga]gainſt deſtiny, if ever my viſits become tedious to you. I cannot tell Sir, reply'd ſhe, whether I ſhould have any cauſe to complain, againſt that which firſt made us acquainted, but I am ſure I ſhall complain againſt you, if you will not acquaint me more precisely who you are. I have already told you Madam, reply'd he, one of the reaſons which hinders me, and I ſhall not deſpaire; but hereafter I may tel you the reſt, if I do not acquaint you with what you deſire to know: you ſpeak Sir reply'd ſhe as if we were to live out all our lives together: and yet in all probability we ſhall quickly part. Since you neither know who I am Madam, reply'd he, and ſmiled) nor what my buſineſſe is, for ought you know, my buſineſſe is to the place unto which you go. my wiſhes do ſo ſeldom happen (reply'd ſhe) that I cannot believe that, and I am perſwaded that accompliſh'd men are ſo far from coming unto the place whether I go that I ſhould rather baniſh all that are there. your language Madam, is ſo obliging (reply'd Meliantes) that though I had no buſineſſe at Alfenes, yet it is my duty to go thither only to make my ſelfe worthy of theſe honours, you have done me. But Madam, to tell you ſomthing of my fortune, be pleas'd to know, that being in an humour of travel, I have ſeen all Greece and having contract'd an intimate amity with Phormion my friend unto whom I am oblig'd for all the pleaſures I have found in his country, I came to ſhew him all Asia, as he hath ſhew'd me all Greece: therefore Madam, having no other buſineſſ but to ſhew him what Asia hath moſt rare and admirable, I cannot do better than follow you, ſince there can be nothing more excellent then your ſelf: But truly Madam (added he) ſince I finde you to be as full of modeſty as beauty; and that your own deſerv'd prayſes make you bluſh. give me leave to tell you that I go unto Alfenes only to ſee the ſtrange and admirable lake of Arethusus which the Tiger croſſed. This being a buſineſſ more rationall than the other (reply'd ſhe) I ſhall be glad you intend it, and ſhall hope to have your good company the longer. Since Phormion had not the language which Arpaſia ſpoke very perfectly, he ſaid little this firſt viſit: but that little he ſaid, ſpoke him worthy to be the friend of Meliantes.

In the mean time, night drawing on, Arpaſia went to walke in a pleaſant garden Page 24 and Meliantes waited upon her, ſo as he ſaw her, and talk'd with her a whole afternoon together. He return'd the ſame night unto Gabrias, and went the next morning unto Arpaſia, with whom he was exceedingly charm'd, and unto whom he was very welcom: Alſo ſhe ſpoke of him unto me, with many teſtimonies of eſteem. Her averſion to Aſtidamus was a great advantage unto him, and ſhe thought it ſome ſweetneſſe that ſhe eſteem'd others more than ſhe did him; But Niſide (ſaid ſhe unto me evening when Meliantes had ſpent the whole day with her) what think you of this ſtranger? am I not very unfortunate to meet with excellent men for my friends, and with a huſband whom I hate? But alas, my fate is ſad, in mee[et]ing with Aſtidamus in lieu of Meliantes? the one is infinitely agreeable to my mind, The other is a man between whom, and me there is an invincible Antipathy, and yet I muſt paſſe away all my dayes with him: This, this is a rigour which I am not able to endure. Me thinks, this would be a revenge upon this injuſtice, if I ſhould beſtow my eſteem upon Meliantes: and I have every moment a fancy to meet with men whom I can eſteem and love; to the end that when I come unto Alfenes, I ſhould have ſo diſpoſed of all my eſteem and amity, that I ſhould not be able to eſteem or love any I ſhall find there. As for amity Madam, reply'd I, I conceive that it is li[m]ited unto a certain number of perſons, beyond which it cannot go: But as for e[steem] I am confident that you being juſt, will, whether you will or no, eſteem all you ſhall think worthy ſo to be; you will eſteem even in Aſtidamus, all that is eſteemable: Truly Niſide (ſaid ſhe to me) my thoughts of him are ſuch, as I am not able to do juſtice unto the goodneſſe that is in him: Not but that I do much condemn my ſelf for it, but yet I cannot chooſe and am ſo little miſtreſſe of my ſelf, and the motions of my own heart, that I believe Meliantes had good reaſon to tell me that all muſt be attributed unto deſtiny: For I am perſwaded that many things which we think we do out of choiſe, are yet indeed done out of a compulſive neceſſity, This then Madam, was the temper of Arpaſias mind, all the while we ſtayed at that place where we met with Meliantes, and our ſtay was longer than we ima[g]in'd: for many meſſengers and meſſages paſſed between Protegenes and Gabrias concerning buſineſſe which was altogether unknown to me: and which had no relation to any thing but the league which they made againſt the King of Assyria, upon which only the marriage of Arpaſia did depend. Thus Meliantes did enjoy the ſight of Arpaſia more in twelve dayes that we ſtayed there, than poſſibly he could in three monthes in a great town: Alſo it may very well be ſay'd, that he knew her ſo well that he knew her too much for his tranquility. For he fell aſ desperately in love with her as ever man was, with any: Yet he told none of it at that time except Phormion unto whom he was forced to confeſs his growing affection: leaſt he ſhould thwart his deſign of ſtaying longer at Alfenes then they intend'd; and as we underſtood ſince he was put unto a pittifull plunge: For Madam, be pleas'd to know, that Meliantes was really call'd Clidaris, of a family very noble in a Province of Assyria, and departing very young from the houſe of his Father, he had travelld ever ſince. But the better to underſtand this adventure, I muſt alſo tel you, that when he departed, he had a ſiſter whoſe name was Cleonide, who at three years of age was ſent to Alfenes by her Father, who had loſt his Wife; and who ſent her thither to be educated with one of his ſiſters, who was married there, ſo as Meliantes had both a ſiſter & an aunt in that place unto which we were to go; but ſuch a ſiſter and aunt as unto whom he was unknown; for his aunt was married in Alfenes before he was born, and his ſiſter was ſo young when he departed, that he could neither know her nor be known; But his greateſt plunge was, that in his ſhewing Asia unto his friend Phormion, he had been at Samosates, where his friend fell ſick: And the worſt was he ſtayed there a long time in courting the affection of a ſiſter unto Aſtidamus whoſe name was Argeliſe. For ſince the mother of Aſtidamus lov'd her daughter very wel, ſhe ſtayed there with her, ſo that Meliantes having made a further progress into her affection then ever he hop'd, when he firſt began to court her, he now found himſelf put to a cruell plunge, conſidering the preſent ſtate and paſſion of his ſoul. Phormion alſo was much ſurpris'd when he diſcover'd his friends love; I beſeech you friend, (ſaid he unto him) do but conſider a little the ſtate of things, ponder upon the ſad ſequells of your paſſion, and the ſmall hopes you have to have in it: For you love a Lady, who within theſe eight dayes is to be married unto a man, whoſe ſiſter believes that you will eternally love her: And the truth Page 25 is Madam, Argeliſe was of that opinion. Yet thus much muſt be ſaid in Meliantes defence, that ſhe did more contribute unto his Errour than he did; for I have perfectly underſtood ſince that when he firſt ſaw her at Samosates, his courtſhip was onely a certain particular civility which many would never have phraſed love, though ſhe did ſo interpret it.

But the reason why this Lady did so easily believe people loved her, was, because shee knew very well she was amiable, and was perswaded all men were apter for Love than amity; and that if any man was assiduous in his visits, presently she thought him to be in Love with her: So that since she pleased Meliantes, hee saw her oft enough to perswade her he was in Love: and she having a strong inclination to him, shee entertained him as a man both loved, and in love with her. But since she could not carry it so, without Meliantes knowing her thoughts, he complied very much with her, and did himselfe thinke he was in Love: For he saw that she was faire, that she pleased him, and that then he loved none but her. Yet upon serious examinon of his thoughts, that kind of affection which he bore unto Argelyse, was rather a gallant kind of friendship, than a violent Love: And yet he hath acknowledged, that when he was separated from her, he beleevd himselfe in Love, and was never out of that opinion, untill he fell in Love with Arpasia.

In the meane time, most certaine it is, that when he left Argelise, he gave her very obliging language: And I am perswaded that if he had never seen Arpasia, he had continued loving Argelise. And indeed, when he resolved to goe unto Alfenes, and shew the Lake of Arethusus unto Phormion, his designe was to Court the affection of Astidamus, though he had no intention then to make him|selfe known; not thinking it fit to appeare in the place where his Sister dwelt, untill he was in better equipage. Also he left off his right Name, and assumed that of Meliantes, purposely to disguise himselfe from Cleonide, untill hee had a Traine proportionable to his Quality: As for his face, she could not know it, for the reasons aforesaid.

But Phormion having lamed his Horse by leaping over a d <...> h, the pretended Meliantes sent his servant unto the next good Towne to get another; and whilst they stayed for his return, the meeting with Arpasia, made such a strange revolution in the heart and designs of Meliantes, that Phormion could not choose but wonder to see his friend so wrapt beyond all reason with his passion: So as he used all his perswasions, arguments and reasons to avert him from this growing passion. I had rather never see the Lake of Arethusus (said Phormion unto him) than to goe unto Alfenes, and see you become the most miserable man alive: And I had rather be the most miserable man upon Earth (replied Meliantes) than be separated from Arpasia: But do not think friend (added he) that I have submitted without resistance: No, I have tryed all wayes to quench my flames, and to revive my affection unto Argelise. Furthermore, I plainly see the odnesse of my designe, and the alteration in my heart towards Astidamus is the strangest thing in the world: For men may love or hate others whom they do know, and alter their minds, but I think it was never heard, that one should love, or hate a man whom he never saw: Yet my design was to purchase the Love of Astidamus, and I have changed my mind before I know him. For though when I came hither, my intention was to love him, yet now I have a disposition to hate him: Truth is, there is a great alteration in the cause; for when I first saw the faire and temptling Arpasia, I considered him as the Brother of my Mistresse, but now look upon him, as my Rivall.

But friend (said Phormion) without any arguments drawn from Argelise to cure your new-taken-up passion, I will only aske you upon what bottom do you ground any hopes? I ground my hopes (replied he) upon Arpasias hating Astidamus, and this thought affords me more delight than I am able to expresse. But friend, replied Phormion, though she do hate him, yet she intends to marry him. 'Tis true, she doth so, answered hee, but she intends it with reluctance: But if you would have me tell you how ingenious my passion is to frame a chimerical hope which hath no foundation but only upon the greatnesse of my Love: I must tell you, my deare Phormion, that Arpasia cannot choose but hate Astidamus, and Page 26 that she hath done all she is able, to love him, but cannot: and it is not impossible but I may be that happy one whom she may desire to hate, but cannot. Alas Meliantes (said Phormion) that heart must needs be too much stung with Love, which can forge any such false-grounded hopes as these. I confesse it friend (replied he) and my folly is not yet so great, but I can see it: Yet there is no other remedy for my misery, and therefore I must love Arpasia, and wait upon her to Alfenes. In so doing (replied Phormion) you waite upon her to her Marriage, and perhaps you will see Argelise there: Oh cruell friend (said Meliantes then) do not blast me with such dire predictions, but let me reason the matter after my own way: But I pray friend, reyled Phormion, how can you reason it to your owne advantage? Those who never knew how to love (replied Meliantes) are not able to finde out such reasons as one that is in Love can: And I believe it is a more easie matter for an Aegyptian to understand the Language of a Persian untaught, than it is for a man who is not in Love, to understand the thoughts of a Lover: But be it as it will, I will love Arpasia untill I know that she loves Astidamus. But what though she should hate him as long as she lives (said Phormion to him) you yet are not a jot the better. I know not what I shall be (replied he) but I am sure I cannot do what I would: and though Argelise should be there, yet I should not change my mind: Not but that I know very well, my passion has a very ill foundation: but yet I will love the faire Arpasia, though it be only to make it appeare that Love is able to grow and subsist without any hopes; at least I am sure the grandure of her beauty will be a good excuse for my weaknesse: and to speake rationally, it is a great injustice to desire any one unto more than he is able; wisdom would cease to be wisdom, if it should move one unto impossibilities. And therefore my deare Phormion, since I am not able to overcome my passion, I beseech you humour me in my weaknesse: and to make me lesse miserable, help me to delude my selfe. This Madam, was the state of Meliantes soul: Phormion seeing it was in vaine to check the love of his friend, and that his dis|ease did every moment encrease, did a little yeeld unto him, and according to his first design resolved to goe unto Alfenes.

In the mean time, Meliantes being all complacence unto Gabrias, he quickly got his love: So as making use of that amity, and desiring to be as inseparable as he could from Arpasia, he beseeched Gabrias to let him waite upon him to Alfenes, and that Phormion and he might passe in the number of those who waited upon him in this voyage, either to honour him, or to satisfie their Curiosity. You may well think, Madam, that Meliantes was not denied; for since his request was agreeable unto the desire of Gabrias, and an honour unto him, he granted it with much joy. Meliantes also carried the matter so handsomely, that none could suspect he had any secret thoughts in his soul: And Arpasia did thinke that the drift of his request was only to be better received in that petty Court, in which Arpasia her selfe was the fairest Starr. However, since she esteemed him very much, she was glad of his design: and now looking upon him as a friend, whom she was not like to loose so soon, she behaved her selfe more obligingly towards him; and likewise he towards her so respectfully, that shee could not choose but be very well satisfied with him: Also she began to speak more sincerely to him, and forcing her selfe lesse than ordinary, shee would sometimes sigh before him; and not telling him the cause, she would shew him some of her sorrows.

But Madam, how joyfull was her sadnesse to him? thinking it to be onely an effect of her hatred unto his Rivall. And it often fell out, that this faire one would speake unto mee in his presence concerning her aversion to Astidamus, thinking that he did not understand the meaning; but hee was better informed than she imagined, for he understood all as well as I did, and hee was so joyed as it may be sayd that Arpasias hatred of Astidamus was one cause of Meliantes Love unto Arpasia.

But in conclusion, all the Negotiations between Protegenes and Gabrias being ended, Gabrias told his Daughter one Evening, that they must depart in the Morning, and that Astidamus would meet her half way between that, and Alfenes. You may well imagine how Arpasia resented this news, for she had some far fetched hopes that perhaps Protegenes and Gabrias would jarr during this long Negotiation, Page 27 and that her Marriage with Astidamus would break off. Meliantes was also as sad as sad could be, but he did so handsomly palliate the Cause, that Arpasia observing him, did imagine that her Sorrows only was the cause of his: yet she did force and temper her Grief by her Vertue and Prudence. But when I was alone with her, she would ease her heart by complaining: Meliantes also for his particular did the same, when he was in private with his Friend Phormion.

In the mean time, the Servant of Meliantes being returned in good time, with a very fine Horse, which he had bought for his Masters Friend, he prepared to wait upon Gabrias and Arpasia, and to advance towards his Rivall. It would be extream rashness in me, Madam, to attempt the relation of all Meliantes and Arpasias thoughts upon this occasion; for I think it is impossible for any to express them, un|less they were Sufferers in the same Predicament with them.

The Miseries which Arpasia apprehended drawing neer, and desiring to ease her Soul by Complaints, she would have me only with her in the Coach: Yet I was rather an Aggravater than an Easer of her Sorrows; For since I verily believed that she must of necessity marry Astidamus, I endeavoured to perswade her that those good Qualities he had might very well excuse his bad ones: For truly, Madam, sayd I, unto her, doubtles he is handsom, he has a good wit, and brave carriage, his company is pleasant and merry, and if one did not know the irregularity of his behaviour, all things desirable might be found in him. Moreover, Madam, since it is not the custome for Persons of your Quality to have the liberty of chosing your Husbands, Fortune commonly choseth them better for you than your Reason can. Alas Niside (sayd she unto me) your Arguments are but weak Consolations; I know Astidamus hath some good personall Qualities, and so far I could willingly let some good ones excuse the bad ones, but since all his Excellencies consist in his Person, and since all his bad Qualities are in his Inclination and Soul, I cannot poize one against another to comfort my self; and there is something so Antipatheous between Astidamus and me, as I cannot tell whether the interest of mine own Glory be prevalent enough to make me sacrifice all the Joyes of my life unto him. This, Madam, was the discourse of Arpasia and me, as we travelled.

As for Meliantes he was in a worse condition, for Gabrias talked with him all that day, and told him as a great favour that he would present him unto Astidamus as soon as ere they met. At last we entred into a great Plaine, and saw a body of Calvalry coming out of a Wood towards us: Arpasia making no question but that it was Astidamus, the very sight had like to have broken all her Resolutions of con|straining her self, and if the Plain had been shorter, certainly she had wanted time to recollect her self. On the other side, Meliantes being upon the point to see him who was to enjoy her, he loved; his heart did beat a most strange disorderly March; yet he had one more struggle with himself, and endeavoured to look upon Astidamus rather as the Brother of Argelise, than as the Lover of Arpasia: but alas all in vain. He no sooner spied this body of Cavalry which appeared, but he looked to|wards Arpasia, and endeavoured to observe her thoughts, and finding nothing in her face but sad Meiancholly, he was extreamly well satisfied. In the mean time, Gabrias not heeding either the sadness of Arpasia, nor the Inquietude of Meliantes, he sayd he would mend his pace, to meet him who was coming towards them, and so he did, so as Meliantes followed as the rest did, and made hast to see a man whom he had desired never to see. The Intervew of Gabrias and Astidamus had all the Civilities and Ceremonies usuall at such meetings: Astidamus alighted first from his Horse, and Gabrias after him, and walking towards one another, they embraced with many expressions of satisfaction. After which Gabrias turned him about, intending to present Meliantes unto Astidamus, thinking he was behind him. But this concealed Lover desirous to defer the Embraces of his Rivall, had mixed him|self with the rest of his Retinue; so as by this means, he was constrained to present them all as they came up: But when he came unto Meliantes, Gabrias made a more particular Eulogy concerning him, purposely to render his Merit the more re|commendable unto Astidamus, who received him most civilly: So as this unfortunate Lover was forced to render unto his Rivall, Civility for Civility. Phormion also was well received by Astidamus, and this Interview passed better betwixt Arpasia and him. Page 28 But to tell you how it was, be pleased to know, that whilst Gabrias was presenting all his Retinue unto Astidamus, our Coach was still advancing, so as we came to the place where these Complements passed, just as Astidamus had ended: and coming then towards Arpasia, doubtlesse it was expected she should command the Coach-man to stop: but her mind being extreamly troubled, she said not a word, so as the Coach-man went on: And I think, if Gabrias had not cryed out unto him to stay, Arpasia would have let him to drive on, though she saw Astidamus well enough coming towards her.

On the other side, there appeared so much disorder in the Countenance of this Lover, that in all my life I never saw the like: For my part, I believe it was an effect of his anger, that Arpasia would not command her Coach to stay; and because he found such a faint coldnesse in the face of that faire one.

In the meane time, as I desired to come out of the Coach, to let him have the more liberty of talke with Arpasia, he would not permit it, but told Gabrias, who presented him to his Daughter, that Protegenes expected them with much impatience, and that he would not retard him from a benefit which he wished so much to receive one, which he did not deserve. Astidamus, Madam, spake this with a kind of forced Civility, though naturally he had a free way, and aire with him: so as it was easie to perceive that his minde was perplexed. Many who ob|served the agitation of his soule, did believe this to be an effect of the Grandure of his passion: but for my part, I always believed it to be an effect of his anger.

In the mean while Meliantes, who slunk away when Gabrias should have presented him unto Astidamus, he drew as neer as he could possible, to see the meeting of Arpasia and him; and indeed he got so neer, that he could observe every motion in their countenances, especially in Arpasias, whom he eyed more then hee did Astidamus: for presupposing him to be in love with her, hee never looked in his eyes: But hoping to find some sparks of aversion in the eyes of Arlpasia, he observed her with so much attention, that whosoever saw him, might plainly perceive that he was deeply concerned in the businesse. At least Phormion told me so since; for my part, I looked upon none but Astidamus only, and wondred to see so much discontent in his face at a time when he should have been all joy, that I know not what to think. However, after some short and slight Complements the Coach went on: Gabrias, Astidamus, and all the rest took Horse and went before: So as I being at liberty to speak my thoughts unto Arpasia, I told her she did not well in not commanding the Coach to stay: Alas Niside (said she to me) I never thought upon any such command: and had I followed my owne inclination, I should have given a command quite contrary: But Niside (said she to me) I think it very strange, that in lieu of upbraiding Astidamus for his faint and hollow accout, you do accuse me, and not him. Since Madam, your incivility did precede his faintnesse (said I very boldly unto her) I must heare him speak, before I can wonder at his proceeding: For I do verily believe, that his anger at what you did, was the cause of his cold behaviour. However it be (said she) hee did me a very great pleasure in receiving me no better; yet I am very angry at it. To be pleas'd and angry both at one thing, replied I, is very strange: Yet I am both (replied she) for my joyes at what he hath done, proceeds principally from his angrying me. Truly Madam (said I unto her) you move mee to abundance of pitty, to see you so carefull to hate a man with whom you are to passe away all your life. Since I am sure (answered she) that it is absolutely impossible I should ever love him: my best course is to finde some comfort in my hatred of him, and that I do perswade my selfe it is just, least I should be constrain'd to accuse my selfe.

In the mean time, being come to the River Tigris, Astidamus by orders from Protogenes, did make us take upon the left hand, purposely to shew Arpasia the Lake of Arethusus, through which the Tigris passeth, and never mingles waters. Afterwards, turning towards the Towne, we entred at a Port towards the Plaine, where Gabrias and Arpasia received many Complements from Protogenes, I shall omit the tedious relating how all the Inhabitants of the goodly Towne were in Armes; how all the streets were full of people, how the windows were adorned with Ladies of quality, and how Protogenes stood expecting at the gate of his Page 29 Palace, not being able to goe any further. Since this meeting had nothing observable in it, I shall passe it over: Yet I must tell you, how Astidamus having recollected himselfe out of that disorder of mind, the cause of which we do not know, he helped Arpasia out of her Coach; and after Protogenes had saluted her, did waite upon her to her Chamber, so as now the Torments of Meliantes and Arpasia did begin to double. Yet Astidamus did not trouble her that night: for since she feined her self to be very weary, he left her to the liberty of her rest: But the next morning she must prepare her self to receive the visits of all the persons of quality in Alfenes of both sexes. It was some comfort unto her that Astidamus came not neer her all that day; for since Protogenes could neither goe nor ride, by reason of some infirmities, it was the Office of Astidamus to shew Gabrias all the Town: but in exchange, Meliantes spent all the day with Arpasia, and was a witness of all the visits which she received: So as knowing the names of his Aunt, and sister, which dwelt in Alfenes, though he knew not their faces, nor they him, he care ully ask'd the names of all the Ladies which came into Arpasias Chamber, and long he ask'd in vaine: But at last towards evening, there came a grave Lady well in yeares, and a young one following, admirably faire, whose names hee also enquired: and presently he was told that the ancient Ladies name was Ferinte, and the young ones Cleonide, so as now he knew the one to be his Aunt, and the other his Sister. Yet he would not make himselfe known unto them; nor trust himselfe unto two persons whose tempers he did not know: nor would he tell Phormion which were they, nor could Phormion know which were they vnlesse Meliantes told him, because he knew not their names, only knew that he had an Aunt, and a Sister at Alfenes. Howelver Cleonide being the fairest and most lovely of all that Arpasia had seen in Alfenes, she received her with as particular civility, as if she had known her to be the sister of Meliantes.

This Lover flattering his passion, and observing the sweetnesse of Arpasia unto Cleonide, he imagined that it was rather an effect of a strong inclination than of beauty: So as making this application unto his advantage, he hoped that perhaps she might have the same inclination unto the Brother which shee had unto the Sister. But the very truth is, Arpasia did only render justice unto the merit of Cleonide: And indeed Madam, a more amiable person could not be upon earth than she; for not only all the features of her face were so many particular beauties, but also she had the Aire of a high beauty; and all the charmes which sweetnesse it selfe could infuse into faire eyes, were questionlesse in hers: Shee had also such a kind of passionate Languor, as whosoever saw her, could not choose but thinke themselves blest in her Love: Moreover she spoke admirably well, and was such a professed Enemy unto all kind of detraction, that shee would give even her Enemies a good word when they deserved it: And if any fault could be found in Cleonide, it was in having a soul too apt to trust such as promised amity; for as she would deceive none, so she thought none would deceive her: and yet this fault did make her appear much more amiable, because she was the very Embleme of sincerity, and that confidence which she had in others, did make her much more charming: Yet she was a little sad the first day Arpasia saw her: And Astidamus after he had carryed Gabrias unto the Chamber of Protogenes, he entred into that of Arpasia, who redoubled her commendations when she saw him, telling him that she admired he should neyver speak of Cleonides beauty, when Protogenes sent him unto Gabrias. Arpasia wondred also he should never mention her unto her. This obliging civility of Arpasia did not only make her unto whom it was addressed to blush, but also it made some alteration in the face of Astidamus; and made him answer as if he were a little non-plust. Yet those who tooke notice of it, believed that the reason was, because he was unwilling to commend one beauty in the presence of another. As for Meliantes, he conceived (as he told me since) that had he been in the room of Astidamus, he should have been answered otherwise; for my part (said he, and spoke unto Arpasia) I am fully perswaded Madam, that such a beauty as yours does so much take up the thoughts of those who behold it, that they have not the liberty of remembring any other. You have very good reason, Sir, to speak as you do (replied Cleonide) being a little nettled) and I assure you, I should think my selfe much obliged unto that person who should think of me in the presence of Arlpasia. Page 30 Meliantes knowing that Cleonide was his Sister, and that it would be known to all hereafter, he valued not his sisters anger, at his under-valuing her beauty, and attributing all unto Arpasia, imagining that when she knew him to be her Brother, she would pardon him.

In the mean time, since she knew it not, she could not choose but contradict Meliantes in all his discourse. As for Astidamus, he was so backward in any obliging expressions unto Arpasia, that every one took special notice of it: She her selfe also perceived it as well as the rest, and better: So that after all the company was gone out of her Chamber, she spoke unto me with so much anger, as made me pitty her. Would not any one say that heard Astidamus speak (said she unto me) that he was already my Husband? and conceiving it fit not to commend the beauty of his Wife, he durst not speak to me at all: Judg I beseech you what he would do, if I should marry him. I professe he behaves himselfe so oddly, that if a stranger were in the company; and were told that I had a Lover amongst them who was to marry me, he would never guess it to bee Astidamus, but would rather think it Meliantes: And to speak the very truth, Astidamus looks like a Husband dasht out of countenance with the commendations that is given to his Wife: and Meliantes talks like a brave and civill Gallant, though he be none of mine.

For my part Madam (said I unto her, though I thought it not) I think Astidamus is so deeply in Love with you, that he is out of his wits, for he was no such man the first time I saw him, Fie, fie, Niside (said she unto me) if Astidamus were out of his wits for the love of me, and did commit any incivilities, they would be of another nature: and hee would sooner disoblige all at the beauties in Alfenes then disoblige mee as he hath done, in commending mee so faintly as hee hath done. As soon as Arpasia had said so, she received very welcome news from Gabrias, for a servant of his came to acquaint her from him in secret, that Protogenes and he were resolved not to proceed unto the Marriage of Astidamus and her, untill they had sent to ask the new King of Assyria's leave, & not to break off with him till the Armie of Cyrus was in the Field, which was not yet neere them enough to declare without danger: adding, that in the mean time they would give secret orders to make sure of the Souldiers, to the end that when they did declare they might be considerable unto that Prince whose part they should take. Arpasia hearing that her misery was at least deferred, she was joyed beyond all expression.

On the other side, Meliantes learning to know the passions of others by his own, he thought that Astidamus was not in Love with Arpasia: so that applying himselfe to discover his thoughts, he observed him with all vigilancy: and the truth is, when Astidamus did straine himselfe to speak Arpasia faire, one might plainly see that his spirit had not its ordinary liberty, but was in a continuall constraint. Moreover, the presence of Arpasia was no hinderance unto him from spending most of his time in such diversions and recreations as most suited with his own inclination, as much as if she had been absent: for he played both night and day at those sports and games which the Lydians invented: Also hee used many obscure and unknown visits, and none knew how he spent halfe his time, nor what he did. But though Astidamus was very slow in his visits of Arpasia, yet Meliantes was velry assiduous, and was continually with her, with whom he was grown a most intimate Confident.

However, Protogenes being noble and magnificent every way, he made continuall Feasts and Banquets; and amongst the rest, he prepared one most gallant, to set forth the variety of the Arethusean Lake: And the better to describe it unto you Majdam, give me leave to speak something of the course of that famous River which runs by Alfenes, and crosseth the Lake of Arethusa; for indeed Madam, the River Tygres hath this particularity, that one little spring which riseth from the Mountain Nithates is the Mother of this River. Truth is, it doth not all the way own the same name; for being very gentle in its first source, the Inhabitants of the Countrey do call it Diglito, as much as to say, slow, and lazie: and it doth not take the name of Tygres, which signifies an Arrow, untill by falling from some grounds which it doth water, it hath gotten the rapidity and swiftnesse of an Arrow; and when it comes to Alfenes, where that great and famous Lake of Arethusa is, it runs through it with such impetuosity, that its waters doe not mingle with it: and the Page 31 Fishes being carryed by the violence of its course, do not mingle with those of the Lake; nor those of the Lake, with them of the River.

On the contrary, this turbulent water is so opposite unto the nature of those Fishes which the Lake doth nourish, that they never come neer the place where the River runs: so as it may very truly be sayd, the Lake and the River are continually together, and yet always separate, since they never mingle. This River hath besides many singularities which are worthy of curiosity: but I must not insist upon them, because it is my businesse to speak of the Lake and the Feast which was made upon it: and only to let you know, that Protegenes having a desire to make it appeare that all the wonders of the Lake were true, his design was to make a very noble Feast upon it, since it had more variety of diversion than any other. 'Tis true, that Astidamus was very busie at this Feast, and took great care of it: and had he behaved himselfe towards Arpasia, as he ought to have done when he spake unto her, she had good reason to be well satisfied with this magnificence. Yet justice must be done unto Meliantes upon occasion, for he did contribute much unto the inventions of this: And the better to describe unto you, Madam, be pleas'd to know; That as soon as Dinner was done, all the Ladies accompanied with those men who were to wait upon them, came unto the banks of the Lake, the Ladies in Coaches, the men on Horses: Yet before I tell you what wee found there, and what we saw, I must represent unto you that Noble and lovely Prospect which that place did offer unto the eye. Imagine that you saw a Lake of so large an extent as it seemed to be a little Sea; but a Sea most serene and calme, where no waves or billows were tossed by the windes; and where the waters were only frizled by such a gentle gale which did not threaten any shipwrack. And imagine also you saw affar off a great and pleasant Countrey watered by the River Tygris; which coming with impetuous force enters into this Lake which crosseth it, and as I told you before, keeps still its naturall swiftnesse: So as in the midst of this quiet and sleeping water, may be seen this turbulent River, rowling its waves one after another with such precipitation, as if it would over-flow a pleasant Meadow, neer which stands the Town of Alfenes.

The very colour of the waters are so different, as it is most apparent they doe not mingle: But that which renders this object the more beautifull, is two stately Pavillions built at the entrance; and at the issue of the River, into, and out of this Lake, purposely to see more conveniently the wonderfull passage of this River, and to view the pleasant prospect. But Madam, to return from whence I digressed, give me leave to tell you, that when all the company was come to the Lake, there was thirty little Barques painted and gilt with stately Tents and Canopies, to umbrage the Ladies from the Suns heate, so as since every Barque would hold eight or ten persons, besides those who guided it; there might be in each so much good company as not to trouble one another: and as commonly every one strives to suit their company to their best content, it is to be believed that every one was well pleased that day. For none was forced into any particular charge, but every one culled themselves as they best liked, without any Ceremony, or consideration of Rank. Yet it was not altogether so: for since some out of their Prudence do constrain themselves, there were some who were not placed where they desired to be.

Arpasia being much taken with Cleonide, she would needs have her and two others in her Barge, where also she was pleased to have me. Also she desired Meliantes to be there; and as for Astidamus he must be there for more reasons than one. As for Protogenes and Gabrias, they were in another, with others suitable to their gravity and age. But when these thirty Barges were all filled, and the pleasant Fleet began to saile upon the Lake, it made the most delightfull object in the world. Besides these thirty Barges which were designed for the Company, there were many others which held Musicians and Servants, which made a most melodious harmony upon the waters. Besides these, there were other designs for Fishers in the River, that it might be apparently seen, the Fishes which were taken in the one, were not the same with the other, although the River run through the Lake. And indeed Madam, the wonder is without any doubt: For our Fleet being sometimes upon the Lake; and sometimes upon the River Tygris, we saw their Nets full Page 32 of fishes twenty severall times, and never found one fish of the lake in the nets that were cast into the river, Nor one fish of the river in any net that was cast into the Lake. though the nets were thrown at a very considerable distance, so as the sight seemed to be incredible. but it was extream delightfull to be sometimes in the calm, and sometimes upon the rough waters: For when we were upon the Lake, we moved unperceivable, and it might be teamed rather a sliding than a sailing, but when we passed from the lake on to the current of the river, we perceived the motion as if it were upon the sea, so as we were most of our time upon the lake where we found most pleasure and most safety: and yet there was not one person who was not desirous to be upon both. But after variety of delights upon the waters, we rowed towards the stately pavilion which was erected at the entrance of the river Tigris into the lake of Arethusus. After landing, all the Ladies were conducted into a great and stately chamber, open on four sides, the better to enjoy this goodly prospect: As for the men, after they had waited upon the Ladies into this chamber, they mounted themselves upon horses which waited for them upon the banks of the river and in a hunting equipage, they prepared themselves. For Protogenes had caused severall wild beasts to be taken in Toyles and brought thither, and let loose; purposely to divert the Ladies. Thus all the gallants were turned hunters, and the Ladies out of windows spectators, the chase began, but could not run out of the Ladies sight, because the Lake and the river did bound them on both sides, & Protogenes had stopp'd the passages on the other sides with toyles, and armed men: So as the Chase ran twenty times under the window of the Ladies; all the men being admirably well hors'd, their habits rich and handsome, this hunting moved much delight. But after the hunting and the fishings were ended, and after the hunters and Fishers had offered the fruits of their labour unto Arpasia, the Ladies were conducted a story higher, where to our wonder we found a most rare collation full of magnificence and variety: yet this was not the conclusion of the diversion; for after we were risen from the Table, we went down again into the room where we viewed the hunting, and where a Ball began. I shall not make any precise relation of the Passages there; nor how unquiet Astidamus appeared: but give me leave to tell you Madam, that Arpasia appeared most admirably fair; and that Cleonide appeared as she was, for though it be very difficult to find two great beauties together, and the one not eclipse the other, yet the beauty of these two being very different, they both preserved their own Lustres. But as for all the rest of the Alfenian beauties, though very sair, yet they must all submit unto Arpasia and Cleonide. Amongst the rest of this assembly, there was one who must needs have a share in my discourse, who though she had no pretence in the earth unto any beauty, yet medled with all the beauties that ever came within the compass of her acquaintance: for I do verily beleive Madam, that since the time that detraction, and slander first began, there was never any so excellent at it as she: and considering the universall hatred which she bore unto all her acquaintance, one would say, she would be revenged upon all mankind; because the Gods had made her no fairer than she was. She would descant as boldly upon the faults of others, as if she had none her self. Yet most certain it is, she was very neer of resemblance unto all that was ugly and disagreeable; yet she had such a kind of bold confidence as made men hardly dare to think of her, as she deserved.

And yet for all that, there were some men, even rational men, who both saw her, and courted her, though I am perswaded there was some secret malignity of spirit in them which made them to take delight in those continuall backbitings and slanders, which she vented. Moreover, all the malicious minded men in Alfenes did so flock unto her with such tales, as was fewell to her detracting humour, that none had better intelligence than she. Moreover, as there were many men in respect of their own honours would not speak so ill of others as she did, because they had an appearance of virtue; so they arrived at their desired end by contracting confidence with this person, whose name was Alcianipe: Thus sparing themselves the labour of detracting they did as much hurt by setting her on, as if they themselves had vented the slander, yes and more; for since it was the accustomed practise of Alcianipe to slander, she was grown wonderfull ingenious in it: And for my part, I cannot chuse but wonder at her memory of things: For Madam, if Page 33 there were any family in Alfenes, which pretended unto Antiquity, she would frame their Genealogy after her mode, and so as should make you beleive it was otherwise than as they pretended. Moreover, if any one of a family had committed any fault, though three ages since; yet all the family must be branded with it, and she would say it was a vice hereditary to all the house, As for the beauty of women she never commended any, but when it might serve her turn to make her pass for a gallant, or make her husband jealous. If she were to be credited, there was not a rich man in all Alfenes, nor any one that was noble nor a man that had not betrayed his friend, nor a woman that had not some private correspondency of gallantry.

Again, she would play at small games, rather than sit out, and exercise her self in triviall scandalls, every woman if fair, was alwayes five or six years elder with her than with any else, and she had a wit so fit for such slanders, that she would make any almost beleive her. For she would dress up her lyes with such probable circumstances, as none could think she could invent them: And though she was known unto all the world to make open profession, of speaking all upon all, without any exception, yet there were a sort of men who did beleive her: Furthermore, since she had made her self to be extreamly feared, many women would visit her, although they knew well enough, that as soon as they were out of her house, she would give a Character to all those that remained: Yet since, they had a conceit that she would speak worst of them, if they did not visit her, they did see her though they never esteemed or loved her. And since many women are more joyled to hear ill spoken of such as they love not, than they are greived to hear ill of themselves, they came to receive that satisfaction from Alcianipe, at the hazard of exposing themselves unto her Satyricall lash; so as by this means she was as much visited, as if she was the best woman in the world. For my part, I confess, I have grumbled at my friends a thousand times for going to her, and I never went, but when I was forced, for I do hate, as I do the Devil such persons as spit all venom, and never speak any truth but when it may do hurt. Moreover, Alcianipe, did speak exceeding well, and made choise of such good phrases to set out her lyes, that none living would imagin she forged them.

This Alcianipe was at this feast, but she came thither with design to make false Descriptions of all that were there, unto Meliantes, who as chance would have it, sate next her; whilst Astidamus took out Arpasia to dance, and he hath since told me, that she had a lash at every one in the company, not excepting Arpasia, who she said was scurvily drest that day, though heaven knows she was never better in her life.

In the mean time, all the men of quality who followed Gabrias, being very desirous to know all those of that petty Court, there was one whose name was Pelinthes, who as any man took any Lady out to dance, he asked their names and qualities; and she answering alwayes according to her humour, Meliantes being one on side, and he on the other, they put a thousand questions to her. I beseech you (said Pelinthes, seeing a Lady of a good presence and quality) tell me who that Lady is? If you should judge of her by the Grandure of her air (replyed she) you would think her to be some kin to the Gods, and to say the truth (added she, to palliate her scandall) she is a very admirable Lady, for every action and word of hers speaks her of a royall race, yet heavens know, her grandfather was no better than a poor stranger, whose Originall the Gods do know and none else, and those who are acquainted with her can tell you, she smells of the businesse of her ancestors in all her inclinations, and though she looks more like a Queen than a Subject, yet she speaks as if her education were amongst the basest sort of peasants: her carriage also displeaseth, she cannot so much as make a curtesy as others do, and has a most ill favoured gate: yet truly to speak truth, she is a very good woman. I beseech you (sayd Meliantes and interrupted her) what man is that who is in the corner of the room, and seems to be so melancholly? and what makes he here at a feast of joy, in so sad a posture? Truly Sir (said she) it is no wonder he should be so sad, for there are very few men who can endure their wives should love all the World; and as gallant as you are Sir, if you were in his room, confident I am, you would be as much perplexed as he is, for that gay and frolick Lady who you see at the other Page 34 end of the room, and courted by so many men is his wife. I do verily beleive her virtuous (added she) but yet she lives very suspiciously. The truth is, she cares not for her husband, she is perpetually from home, and corrected continually by a croud of gallants, whilst her poor husband for his honours sake dare hardly shew himself, but sleeps at home.

In the mean time, tis he who pays for all the entertainment the wife makes unto her gallants, and for her rich dress which invites them to her, and I beleive also pays for the pictures which she bestowes upon her Adorers, and she is as jolly a Lady as ever lived unto those who visit her, and will take no notice of her behaviour, or her husbands misery.

I am sure (replyed Pelinthes, and shewed her another Lady, who appeared very melancholly) that yonder Lady does not put her husband unto any such sorrows, at least she hath not the garb of gallantry. Truth is (said she) she does not make him jealous; but she torments him as bad another way: For she being a well accomplished woman, she thinks him too highly obliged unto her, and puts him to abundance of torment, for she is so jealous, as that she hates all the women she sees, and puts incivilities upon them, yet truly I think she cannot be accused of gallantry, for I beleive her virtue was never put to the test. I see another, next her (replyed Meliantes) who looks high enough to scorn her husband if she have one, you are not mistaken Sir (said she) for she being of a better family than him she married, she treats him more like a slave than a husband, and the worst is, because he is inferiour unto her. she admits of gallants inferiour unto him. Her Injustice is so great (replyd Pelinthes) that I wil no longer look upon her; but had rather ask you who the man is which is behind her, & is so magnificent? would not any one think, said she, that he was the owner of all the riches in the coffers of Craesus? and yet he is only a man of fortune without any Estate, nor can any tell how he lives: Some think that his expences are at the cost of other men, and I beleive the man who stands next Arpasia, prays for it. However, he whom you see next Protogenes, is hugely rich, but extreamly covetous: The other next him is abominably prodigall though poor; that young Lady not far off him, is as very a gossip as ever lived, she in the blew is as crafty as ever lived, and that other in the carnation ribands, is the most envious woman a live; for she is vexed to the heart if any other have any thing that is good. After his, Alcianipe looking upon all the company, and without any intreaties from Meliantes or Pelinthes, she began a most bitter invective and false, Satyricall Character of every one there.

Meliantes, seeing she had a good word from none. resolved to speak of his rival, and Alcianipe after a hint upon the ill dresse of Arpasia, she began to commend her highly, on purpose to have a better occasion of blaming Astidamus: For (said she unto Meliantes) Considering his behaviour unto her, one would say that he did not think her fair, but tis no wonder (added she) for he is one of the most irregular minded men in the world; and had I been acquainted with Gabrias. I would have hindred him from giving his daughter unto a man of such a temper, then did she begin to tell him of all the extravagancies of Astidamus, (...) g a hundred things more than ever were true, but I am the most mistaken woman in the world, (said she) if Astidamus have not some secret haunts which withdraweth his mind from Arpasia: for he sometimes goes out very early, and comes in very late and none knows where he hath been, and sometimes an unknown messenger brings him letters, but tis no matter, I shall know the intrigue of the business within this eight dayes, and shall set so many spies upon him, that it shall be hard for him to escape me.

Oh I beseech you let me have share in your confidence (said Meliantes then unto her very earnestly,) with all my heart said she, upon condition that in your observation of Astidamus, you will acquaint me with all your discoveries. You may well imagin Madam, that Meliantes did willingly promise her what she desired, so their treaty ended, they parted, and all the company broke up. And the same barges which brought us thither, carried us back, for the Moon being at the full, and the heavens cleer and serene, Protogenes foresaw it would be the most pleasant returning in the night: And indeed Madam, I do not think there ever was a more pleasant voyage than this of the night, the day being nothing comparable Page 35 unto it, and universall silence rained all over, and was not interrupted by any thing but only the noise of oares, a gentle waft of wind brought the perfumes of the meadows upon the water: The Moon and the Stars were as well in the Lake as in the Firmament. But questionless, the greatest pleasure was in the conversation of Arpasia, Cleonide, Meliantes and Astidamus, for all returned in the same Barge in which they came. When we had put off from shoar, and discoursed a little upon the finesse of the night, Arpasia having already heard enough concerning Alcianipe, and taking notice how Meliantes talked a long time with her, she began to chide him, and tell him that she could hardly pardon the choice he made: For to make use of a comparison which the place affords me, said she, The fishes in the river Tigris mingle not themselves with those of the Lake, nor they of the Lake with those of the river, even so would I have all the world do, for though the good and the bad be promisciously together in the world, yet I would never have them to mingle; but after the example of these fishes keep apart: Let the virtuous never have any commerce with the vicious, let the good be with the good, and the bad with the bad, the angry with the angry, the merry with the merry, wits with wits, fools with fools, and so like to like will ever be most suitable: I would not have Meliantes who is the freest man alive from detraction, hold conference with the most scandalizing woman upon earth. I give you thanks Madam (replied Meliantes) for your wise advice; but perhaps Madam (said Cleonide, who owed Meliantes a spite since the first meeting) you are not so just as you imagine your self, for I can put very small difference between him that can with delight hearken unto detraction, and her who doth detract, and therefore since Meliantes made choice of Alcianipes company, you do him too great a favour to say he is the freest from detraction of any man alive; for had he been a hater of it, he would have changed place, and betook himself unto better company than hers, he applied himself unto.

Perhaps (replied Meliantes and smiled) the fair Cleonide will repent of the wrong she does me, when she knows me a little better; and in the mean time, I must tell her, that it was chance only, that brought me unto that place, where I met Alcianipe: And my curiosity to know, whether all the reports of her were true, made me hold discourse with her. However, replied Astidamus, I beseech you tell us, how you found her? Though to say, that Alcianipe was a little free in telling me her thoughts of every thing; does not imply that she is detraction (replied Meliantes) yet I must not tell what she said; but I had rather commend what the fair Arpasia hath said, than to blame Alcianipe for what she said: And the wish which the fair Arpasia made is altogether just, for fortune is most injurious in indissolubly linking the interests of persons who are of an opposite humour together, and forcing them to live miscellaniously together when they may finde others, who are more suitable to their humour. I am confident (added Arpasia,) that there is no town in the world where such an equal partition may not be made, and where every one may please himself in his own Quarters, without going unto others. Where on the contrary, as things are disposed, there are few men who are not weary of what they are obliged to do, and of the the persons whom they are obliged to see, so it would be better if every one might please themselves. 'Tis true, replied Astidamus, it were very well if it could be so, and if it could, I believe few would stay in the place where they are, I believe (said one of the Ladies in the company) there would be a change in most of the barges upon the Lake. Truly, I am so little worthy to be where I am (replied Meliantes most modestly) that I should fear abanishment. Indeed you have talked with Alcianipe so long, (replied Arpasia and smiled) that you do almost deserve it: but since, I am perswaded you talked with her, only to convert her from speaking ill of others, I assure you by my consent you should not change your place. For my part (said Astidamus, not so much as looking upon Arpasia) I am so well where I am, that rather than pass into another, I would throw my self into the lake, that testimony of affection which you express unto the company (replied Cleonide and both smiled and blusht) is not so great as perhaps the fair Arpasia imagines; for since iron will not sink if it be thrown into this lake, you would not be in any danger of drowning, if you should throw in your self: And therefore to render the testimony of your esteem more valuable, you should say that you would throw your self into the river which hath Page 36 that wonderful virtue that makes the Lake so famous. The Lake is so neer the River (replied Astidamus and laughed) that you need not quarrell with me about it, unless you would have me understand by it, that I should go out of the barge, if Arpasias wish should come to pass, and yet (added he upon second thoughts) I am perswaded, that if all the good were with the good, all the wicked with the wicked, all fools with fools, and all wits with wits, the world would not be so pleasing as it is: For that universall miscellany of so many different humours in it, is a great part of its beauty. I assure you replied Arpasia that if diversity of men do make the beauty of the world, I am sure its beauty is oft times a punishment unto all men of accomplishments: For there can be no greater torment than to be always with persons whom they esteem not, and yet as things are ordered, half of our lives are spent amongst the people whom we wish we never saw I must confess (replied Astidamus) that we are not alwayes where we would be, and at this very houre, if a change were permitted to be made amongst all the barges which are upon the Lake, what hath already been said, would be found to be true. But I beseech you, (replied Cleonide,) who do you imagine would change their places? After this, Astidamus answering only to satisfie his curiosity, he went from barge to barge to see who were in them; so as visiting all the rest, they were all highly pleased, that the persons might divide themselves according to their fancies. But since Astidamus, Cleonide, and the Alfenian Ladies did best know the stories of their town, they were to appoint who was to shift into this barge, and who into that; so as changing all the order of the company in generall, there was scarcely one in all the company who had not their places assigned them but only Alcianipe: Arpasia observing this, earnestly beseeched Cleonide, not to place her in her barge. for I do protest said she, I do so abhor detracting persons, that if you should bring her hither, I should rather wish my self in the bottom of the Lake, than in her company. I had rather ten millions such as she were thrown into the river Tigris, replied Meliantes) than that you should expose your self into the lake: Truly (added she) scandalizing people are worthy of the worst punishments: and of all Detractors, a woman is most odious; I could endure it with more patience from the mouth of a man than from a woman. For as there are some virtues more necessary in a woman than in a man, so there are some vices more tollerable in men than in women: For one cannot scandall, but one must lye, and one cannot lye, but one must be insolent and bold, which is a quality most unbecoming a woman: men are permitted to be bold, & therefore more allowable to scandall than women, who if they will keep within the limits of modesty ought never to act any virtue with too much boldness, and therefore I must conclude a woman slanderer, to be a monster; and that she who will wound the reputation of another, cares not for her own, but may well be suspected of all the crimes which she fasly brands upon others. I see, (said Astidamus) that we cannot all tell what to do with the poor Alcianipe, but that we must leave her in some barge by her self: It had been well, answered Arpasia, if we had left her at her own house; but the worst is, almost all the world takes more delight in hearing others slandered, than in hearing them commended.

As Arpasia said so, she did not only see the barge where Alcianipe was coming neer hers, but understood how that Lady beseeched her leave to speak a word or two with Meliantes, so that as much as she hated her for her slandering, yet since she could not be uncivil before so much company, she could not deny her: but consented so coldly, as made it apparant shee was displeased. In the mean time Meliantes was pitifully non-plust, yet since he could not deny speaking unto a person of her quality, and since his promise engaged him, he leaned towards the barge where Alcianipe was, who leaning also towards him, told him in his ear, that since he left her, she had learned some things which did oblige her to promise him the second time to discover the business within these eight days, whereof she told him she had some suspicion. Meliantes could not choose but thank her, & beseech her not to fail of her word, and he spake so loud, that Arpasia heard, and could not choose but chide him. Assoon as Alcianipes barge was parted from hers. On the other side Astidamus who understood better than any what they said, hearing that Alcianipe had promised Meliantes, to discover a business unto him, he told Arpasia of it, little thinking that he himself was concerned in it. After this they began so Page 37 unanimously to importune him to tell what it was which Alcianipe had promised to him. Whatsoever she said (replied he and smiled) it was a secret of no great importance if I should tell it in the presence of seven or eight persons at once. Then choose one amongst all the company (replied Arpasia) unto whom you may impart the business you have with such a dangerous person, and so justify your selfe.

If it be so that she keep promise with me (answered he) perhaps I shal be as desirous to tell you, as you are desirous to know it. The company is not extreemly beholding to you, replied Cleonide, since you do not think one in it worthy to be trusted with a secret which cannot be of any great importance, since Alcianipe, is a partner in it with you. Since the barge came to land, just as Cleonide had spoken, Meliantes returned her a short answer of civility, & presented his hand to conduct her to her coach; for Astidamus being obliged to wait upon Arpasia, reason did bind him to submit, and help Cleonide, who knew not that he was her brother. But Madam, not to trouble you with trifles, let me only tell you, Meliantes grew into such favour with Arpasia, that at last she told him of her aversion to Astidamus, and complained unto him of his behaviour, towards her, yet she told me since, that she would not have done so, had she not perceived that he had discovered the thoughts of her soul, so as conceiving it better to trust him with a secret, and so oblige him, she did impart it to him. And chance did something contribute unto this confidence, for Meliantes talking a whole afternoon with her, a hundred odd discourses passed between them which they never thought on at the beginning, Yet Meliantes mentioned not the least hint which might move her to suspect he was in love with her; but he used his best Rethorick to purchase her esteem and amity, for he did most ingeniously insinuate into all her thoughts, and pictured her in such an obliging manner, that she did not conceal the least thought of her heart from him.

In the mean time, Phormion seeing the love of Meliantes to increase every minute, he endeavoured to bring Argelise, into his thoughts purposely to take him off from Arpasia, but all his endeavours were fruitless: For Arpasias aversion to Astidamus and her confidence, did so flatter his passion, that though he had no reasonable hopes, yet he thought it injurious to resist his passion. Again, the promise of Alcianipe coming into his memory, he went unto her the last of the eight days, which she prefixed, yet he could not be satisfied in what he desired to know, and yet he understood enough to augment Arpasias hatred of Astidamus: For Alcianipe told him of an infallible certainty, that Astidamus had long since contracted his affection with a Lady of quality, and moreover, that she knew he had promised her, never to marry Arpasia, assuring him, that within the compass of four dayes more at furthest; she should be able to tell him, her name. You may imagine Madam, how welcome this news was unto Meliantes; yet since he knew Alcianipe to be a most horrible backbiter, he feared extreemly, least all this should not be true.

But since one is apt to believe any thing which flatters a violent passion, he did verily believe that Astidamus was in love with some other besides Arpasia; and the rather, because he saw no reason in the earth, why he should behave himself as he did, with that most admirable Lady: So as conjuring Alcianipe most earnestly to finde out the name of her with whom Astidamus held such private correspondency, she promised him to satisfie his desire.

In the mean time, Meliantes being come from her house unto Arpasias, he understood that Astidamus, had not been there all that day, nor the night before: So that he began to accuse him of most horrible injustice, for applying himself with no more assiduity unto her.

For my part (replied Arpasia) his presence doth so little please me, that if I were not condemned to live all my life with him, I should be very glad never to see him again. But since I must marry him, 'tis very strange he should behave himself towards me, as he doth. 'Tis a great misfortune not to love one, whom one is to marry, but it is a greater to be slighted and scorned by such a one: Did Astidamus love me and I not love him again? I should think that my aversion might in time wear away, but both hating him, and being hated, what likelihood is there, I should overcome my hatred? For nothing in the world is more natural than not to love those who love not us, especially when they do not seem amiable.

Page 38 Meliantes seeing her in this mind, would needs perswade her to acquaint Gabrias with her aversion to Astidamus, and to intreat him not to oblige her to marry him, but she told him again, that since her Father made that match only to confirm the treaty with Protogenes, purposely to be revenged upon the King of Assyria, it was not probable he would break it off upon a bare aversion, having no other ground but that Astidamus does not express any affection. But Madam, (said he) being transported by his passion) if you did know that Astidamus was far in Love with another, and did promise her every day never to marry you, would you not let Gabrias know it also? Doublesse I should, replied Arpasia; but what probability is there, that Astidamus should let his Uncle send to the King of Assyria, if he did not intend to go on with the marriage? Since they send only to that Prince, rather to amuse him than to ask his leave, said Meliantes, Astidamus cares not for it; And since he can be so unjust as not to love you, but to love another, it is not strange if he be as irregular in point of Prudence, as in point of Love. But I beseech you Sir (said Arpasia to him) what moves you to speak thus? is this the secret business which Alcianipe promised you to discover? For Heavens sake Meliantes, I conjure you by our amity to conceal nothing from me that may be prejudicial unto Astidamus. This conjuration is so prevalent Madam, (replied he) that I cannot withstand it; and then he began ingeniously to tell her all that Alcianipe told him, and what she had further promised to tell him. Alas, alas Meliantes (said she) since Alcianipe doth not more particularize things, nor tell the name of her unto whom, she saith, Astidamus hath promised never to marry me, I cannot) put my Father out of conceit with him, and Alcianipe hath such a reputation for lying, that what she saith will never persuade Gabrias unto what I desire: Not but that I do verily believe Astidamus is deeply in love with some, or other; who is in Alfenes, for when I first saw him, he did not behave himself as now he doth to me, and therefore I conclude; that it is the presence of this person who ere she be, that obliges him unto it: But however it be (added she) we must endeavour to know more. and therefore though I do extremely hate Alcianipe, yet I desire you to continue seeing her, and oblige her to tell you the name of this pretended Mistress unto Astidamus, for when we know it, perhaps we shall discover all the rest without Alcianipe. Meliantes ravished to hear Arpasia speak thus, did most willingly promise, what she desired, and waited with abundance of impatience for the day which Alcianipe appointed to tell him the name of her, whom Astidamus loved.

Since I was very intimate with Arpasia, I was not ignorant of the confidence which she put in Meliantes, and he knew also, what thoughts she had of me: so as when we and opportunity met together, we discoursed of all that related unto this most admirable Lady: We endeavoured to guess who it could be; that Astidamus should prefer before her; but all our conjectures were so wide of the mark, that we could not ground any reasonable suspicion of the person. But at last the day which Alcianipe had assigned being come, he went to challenge her promise, but could not meet with her, yet at her going out, she left order to tell him that she was gone unto Cleonides Aunt, and that she referred it to his choice, whether he would come unto her, or stay till she returned, which would be very shortly. Though Meliantes did not fear being known by his Aunt, or his sister, with whom Alcianipe was, yet he would not go thither, but chose rather to stay till she returned, conceiving that if he made that visit, it would be longer before he could be satisfied in what he so much desired to know; so as he going into a garden which belonged unto the house of that Lady, he walked there in a long expectation of her return: But when he saw Alcianipe return with a blith, and merry countenance, he doubted not but that his curiosity would receive a full satisfaction.

Well Madam, (said he as soon as he saw her) Do you know the name of that fair one, who has so much power as to make Astidamus unjust unto the most admirable Arpasia? I know it so well Sir, replied she, that none can know any thing more certain, but my greatest wonder is, that we should no sooner discover the intrigue of the business: for the very name of Cleonide, was no sooner mentioned, but a hundred passages which I had seen did come so fresh unto my memory, that Page 39 I was sure, there is a most intimate correspondency between Astidamus and her. How Madam, (said Meliantes, much amazed to hear the name of his Sister) Is it Cleonide, with whom Astidamus holds a correspondency of gallantry? Yes, (replied she) and I no sooner heard it was she, whom he loved but I went to her, purposely to observe her countenance very exactly in talking of Astidamus, and her Aunt not being present, I had so much discourse with her, as hath fully satisfied me of the truth; for I made her blush a hundred times in talking of Arpasia, and I am sure she is not only in love, but she is jealous also: And she has not so much confidence in the promises of Astidamus, as she has fears, least the beauty of Arpasia should make him inconstant, or at least, though he should not be unfaithful, yet his respects unto Protogenes will oblige him to obedience.

But I beseech you Alcianipe (replied Meliantes) are you sure that it is Cleonide with whom Astidamus holds correspondency? for I have heard say, that she is a very solitary person; and I perceive she rather flies the world than courts it: This true, (replied she) that Cleonide shuns all company; but her reason for it is, to remove all cause of jealousy from Astidamus: Moreover, it is not a new taken up affection; for he was in love with her before ere he saw Arpasia: and yet his heart was much moved with her beauty the first time he saw her; but as soon as he was out of her sight, and returned to Cleonide, this vapour of love vanish'd, and his first to Cleonide became more violent, and he told Cleonide when he returned, that Arpasias beauty had charmed his eyes, but not his heart; or if she had, one favorable look from her, would have dissolved the enchantment. How is it possible replied Meliantes, you should come to know all these particular circumstances? nay I know more yet (added she) for I know that it is at the house of one of her friends, where she meets with Astidamus, and she meets him at such hours, as they can not be interrupted, because commonly it is late. But Madam, (replied Meliantes) Cleonide passeth for a person of virtue and honour. As for virtue Sir, (replied Alcianipe) I believe shee is the owner of it, and though not naturally, yet out of prudence; shee knows Astidamus so well, that shee perceives to be austere is the only way to be loved long; for my part (replied Meliantes) I must give a more noble motive unto the virtue of Cleonide, and believe, that though Astidamus, were not of that humour, yet she would carry her self towards him as she doth, However it be (said Alcianipe) Cleonide cannot be accused for managing the affection of Astidamus; for as I said before, she meets him every evening at her friends house. I must confess replied Meliantes, I cannot well comprehend how this can be. You will better comprehend it Sir, (answered Alcianipe) when I have told you that her aunts garden and her friends are close together, that there is a door out of the one into the other; that her friend is a widow, and that her aunt suspecting nothing of the league between Astidamus and her Niece, permits her to walk every evening with her friend, and never thinks much, though it be late before she return. Thus Astidamus sees her when he pleaseth; And that he may see her unseen or unknown, he goes through the house of one of his friends who lives in another street, and who hath a back door opposite to that garden door of Cleonides friend, Astidamus his servants stand waiting at the fore-door of his friend with whom people think he is so that there is almost none but his confidant and her confidant, who know any thing of the business. Than it must necessarily be, replied Meliantes, that one of these confidants, have betrayed their trust, since you do know it: No (said she) but it is a maid whom Cleonides friend turned out of her service, which maid is sister unto another, who serves me; it is she who knows all the passages, not only out of her own knowledge and sight, but also by another maid servant unto Cleonide, who told her all these Circumstances. And yet I assure you that Cleonide did what she could to hinder her friend from turning away her maid, least she should tell tales, but she would not be persuaded: And certainly (added Alcianipe,) they expose themselves to much danger, who trust their servants with their business of gallantry; for when such persons know any secret of that nature, their mistresses are their slaves: and I know Cleonide stands in strange awe of her servant, because she knows of her affection, so that it must be concluded, she loves either her honour, or Astidamus very well, since that she dares not turn her away: However, her friend, wanting her patience, and Page 40 not being so much interested as she was, she discharged her maid, from whole mouth I know all this that I tell you.

Perhaps (replied Meliantes) she added more than is true; no, no, (replied Alcianipe after her detracting manner) I know she hath not told me all: and that there is yet much more behind; yet she told me, that she is fully persuaded that Astidamus, though he do love Cleonide, and not Arpasia yet he will deceive the first of these, and marry the second, because he dare not disobey Protogenes, from whom he expects all his fortunes, so as it may be thought, he will deceive both and himself too.

After this, Meliantes seeing he could get no more out of Alcianipe, he left her, after many desires not to publish what she knew, pretending that his design was not to prejudice Astidamus, but indeed his reason was, least the reputation of his sister should be stained. As soon as he quitted Alcianipe, he met Phormion whom he found so sad and unquiet that he was sure something troubled his mind.

Meliantes then was in a great perplexity, for on the one side he was much joyed to see that he was able to prejudice Astidamus, but on the other side, he was very sorry to know of the League between his sister and him: A resentment of love, and a resentment of honour did so divide his soul, that he was not able to reconcile so great a difference by himself, and therefore he resolved to impart his grief unto his friend, who already knew all the secrets of his life. So that after Phormion had asked him how he did, they sat down together in a place fit for discourse, and then he told him all he knew, and afterwards told him, how not foreseeing how this Lady whom Alcianipe said was mistress unto Astidamus, could be his sister, he had ingaged himself unto Arpasia, to acquaint her with her name, as soon as Alcianipe had informed him. Unto what a strange dilemma am I driven (said he) for to prejudice Astidamus. I must tell Arpasia that he hath promised Cleonide; never to marry Arpasia: And to save up the reputation of my sister, it is fit I should conceal the gallantry of Astidamus to her: However, to argue rationally, though honour forbids me to break off the marriage of Astidamus with Arpasia, yet doubtlesse I ought to acquaint her with all passages, purposely to oblige her not to marry him, and to force him to marry Cleonide. But by what right, replied Phormion, can you force him to marry Cleonide, since you have had as great a correspondency with his sister as he hath with yours? Ah Phormion (said Meliantes) there is a great difference between Astidamus and me; for he loves Cleonide, and I do only esteem Argelise, and therefore it is much more obligation for him than for me, to keep promises; than for me I say who am so deeply in love with Arpasia, that I am not able to answer the affection of Argelise, And yet to speake truly, I know, that if Astidamus was acquainted with all passages at Samosates, he had almost as good reason to complain against the correspondency which I held with his sister, as I have against him for holding correspondency with mine. I know also that it becomes me not to publish the gallantry of a person who is so nearly allied to me; but I know withall, that loving Arpasia as I do, I must consider the satisfaction of my love; and without any respects of Justice, Honour, Interest of a sister, or Argelise, I must resolve to act according to the dictates of my love; and therefore my dear Phormion I must acquaint Arpasia, with the love of Astidamus to Cleonide, and also tell her she is my sister, as the greater testimony of my affection, and the more to oblige her unto secrecy. Then I see (said Phormion) that you are resolved to acquaint her with your quality, and more than that, (replied he hastily) for I am resolved to acquaint her with my love: Truth is, I know not well whether I can or no; for I am so full of fears to offend her, and oblige her to change her way of living with me, that I cannot tell whether I have power to tell her. For my part (replied Phormion) I should think it better to stay, untill her marriage with Astidamus, was quite broken off: should I follow your advice (replied Meliantes) she would think I crossed the designs of Astidamus, only as the brother of Cleonide, and not in any consideration of her interest. Were it my case as tis yours (replied Phormion) I would not yet mention any thing unto Arpasia; but should conceal both my being her Lover, and Cleonides brother: So that thinking you to be only her friend, she will give more credit unto your words and not thinking you to be the brother of Cleonide, she will not imagine you have any concern (...) Page 41 but her own in the business. Meliantes finding the advice of Phormion to be very rational, he resolved to follow it. This being resolved upon, Meliantes went unto Arpasia, with intentions to acquaint her with the affection of Astidamus to Cleonide, yet intending to conceal what might be disadvantageous to himself, and to speak more of the affection of Astidamus to Cleonide; than hers to him. Yet he could not speak in private with her, so soon as he hoped, because he found both this unfaithful Lover, and his sister there.

As soon as they were set down, Astidamus told Cleonide in a low voice, that he had received a Letter from a friend of his at Samosates, which let him understand, that ere long he should know her dear brother, whom she so much desired to know. Arpasia hearing what Astidamus said, she began to speak, and addressing her words unto Cleonide, though I think (said she) that Astidamus did intend that you only Madam, should hear him, yet I beseech you, give me leave to intrude into your discourse, and ask how it comes to pass, you should have a brother whom you know not.

Since I was not above three years of age Madam, (replied shee) when I left the Province where I was born, to come and live with my aunt at Alfenes; and since I never saw my brother, but at that age, I may very well say I know him not; for certainly he is much altered since that time, and though Clidaris was very like me, yet I believe I should not know him: Yet by his letters, I should know him very well, for I have received many Letters from him, yet for all that I should not know his face if I should meet him. If he be such a man as my friend describes him, replied Astidamus you have reason to desire the sight of him; for his Letter tells me, that he is one of the most handsomest men, and best wits in the world: It tells me also, that he is very kind with one of my sisters, who dwells in that place, and speaks so highly in his commendations, that I am already his friend before I see him, You may imagin, Madam, how Meliantes was non-plust, when he heard himself thus talked of in his own presence; yet he was afraid, least he should render himself suspect, if he should put in nere a word; and therefore he asked Astidamus very confidently when Cleonides brother would come thither? I cannot tell you (replied he) for the Letter beares no date.

For my part (replied Cleonide) I wish that none had writ so much in his commendations; for commonly high commendations raise high expectations, and the person must be highly meritorious, that can answer them. It is so very likely, that the fair Cleonide hath a most deserving man to her brother (replied Arpasia very obligingly) that I have a great disposition already to esteem him whensoever he comes, Your expression Madam, replied she, is infinitely obliging, but to know whether I may in reason believe what is writ concerning my brother, I must aske whether he, who gives this Character of my brother, be a competent Judge of true merit? or whether he be not one of those common commanders, who use to make no difference between persons of inferiour parts, and persons of extraordinary merits? No on, (replied Astidamus) he who writ the Letter gives the same Character of Clidaris, and therefore I dare answer for him, for if my freind have any fault, it is in being too niggardly in his commendations, and in his esteeming over few persons, and therefore I am most confident that Clidaris is a most excellent man, and has a million of most admirable parts, since my friend commends him: For he who writ this Letter is so curious to be pleased, that there are scarce four men in the Province where he lives, who are sufficiently accomplished for his pallet, and to define him in few words, he is one of those nice and delicate men who use to anatomize the hearts and spirits of any before he will commend them, who examines all the words and actions of those he sees, and who will see into their very thoughts before he will speak either good or bad of them. Judge then, whether I have not reason to be confident, that Clidaris, is worthy to be Cleonides brother.

After this, Astidamus according to his custom turned the talk, of which Meliantes was very glad, and was very frolick in discourse; yet what soever he said, still he was nothing at all appliant unto Arpasia.

Presently after, Cleonide going away, Astidamus went also, So that Meliantes remaining alone with Arpasia, he looked upon him very seriously; for reflecting upon what Astidamus had said concerning the brother of Cleonide, she imagined (considering Page 42 the place where she met him, and his desires to conceal his country) that Meliantes might be he; And the rather, because the Character which was given of Cleonides Brother, did fit him. Yet not desiring to make her suspicion appear until further certainty, she roused her selfe out of her serious study, just as Meliantes intended to interrupt her to tell her what he had understood from, Alcianipe, and beginning to speak: Considering the state of things, I am very sorry Madam (said he unto her) that I cannot speak as well of Astidamus, as they have written unto him concerning Cleonides brother; But Madam, the fidelity I have vowed unto you, and the zeale that I have unto your service, forces me to tell you that I do know the name of her whom Astidamus hath long loved, and unto whom he hath promised never to marry you: I wish with all my heart (replied she) that he would keep his promise. But Meliantes (added she) who who is she that hath so captivated the heart of Astidamus? It is Cleonide, Madam (replied he) and I know such circumstances of his affection to her, that I must needs say he is infinitely too blame to be so engaged as he is; How (cried out Arpasia) is it Cleonide, with whom Astidamus holds intelligence? Yes Madam (answered he) it is Cleonide; and Alcianipe hath so particularized things unto me, that I cannot make the least doubt of the truth.

Alcianipe is so scandalous (replied she) that there is no great heed to be taken unto what she saith: But since I know how to discern truth from lies (replied he) I dare assure you Madam, that Astidamus doth love Cleonide.

After this, Arpasia was a while mute: and reflecting upon her former suspicions, they all vanished, and she thought no more that Meliantes was Brother unto Cleonide, since he told her of the intelligence which she had with Astidamus. Afterwards calling to memory a hundred passages which formerly she took no notice of, she found, that indeed there was good cause to think that Astidamus loved Cleonide: But maugre her aversion to him, she could not choose but beare him a kind of spite for loving that faire one: Yet her slight resentment of it quickly vanished, and in a moment after she was extremely joyed, in hopes that this love of Astidamus would break off her Marriage: and she gave so many testimonies of it unto Meliantes, that hee was fully satisfied. Yet notwithstanding, since she was resolved to stay until Astidamus did himselfe break off, because she was afraid to anger her Father, Meliantes was forced to tell her that though Astidamus did dearly love Cleonide, and had promised her to break off his Marriage for her sake; yet because all his fortunes did depend upon Protogenes: and because he was afraid to loose them by losing his favour, he was resolved to marry her, and to deceive Cleonide. How (said Arpasia then) does Astidamus intend to marry me, and not to love me? and to love Cleonide, and not marry her? Oh Meliantes, I am not able to endure this double treachery: And since I should be more miserable in marrying a man, who neither loves me, nor I him, than Cleonide would be, in not marrying a man who both loves her, and she him. it is my office to prevent such a misfortune: For truly, though I had no aversion to him, yet his very infidelity to Cleonide is enough to hinder mee from marrying him: therefore I beseech you Meliantes, help me out of this extream strait, and endeavour to get such convincing proofs of the promises which this Impostor hath made unto Cleonide, that I may shew them unto my Father, and afterwards declare unto him, that I never will marry Astidamus.

Meliantes hearing what Arpasia said, began to study upon it, and to imagine how he might give her satisfaction: After which, he desired some dayes of consideration, conjuring her in the interim not to speak a syllable of what he had told her for feare (said he) that if Protogenes should heare of Astidamus his love, he should hasten his Marriage with her.

Thus Meliantes glossing the reputation of his sister with a plausible pretence, he bestowed a thousand obliging and tender expressions upon Arpasia; who conceiving her selfe infinitely beholding unto him, began to presse him a little more earnestly to tell him who he was. I beseech you Meliantes (said she) what justice is it, that you should know all the secrets of my very soule, and that I should not know so much of the Country which gave you a birth? When Madam I have done you any considerable service (replied he) I promise you to tell you who I Page 43 am: And to set a more certain limit of time unto your satisfaction, I promise to tell you whatsoever you shall desire to know of me, upon the day that your Marriage with Astidamus shall be broken off. But in the interim Madam (added he being transported by the violence of his passion) I beseech you honour me so far as to believe, that my birth is such, as that I am not altogether unworthy to be ranked in the number of your friends: And if Astidamus had such thoughts in his heart as I have, he had never loved Cleonide. Though this expression was a kind of declaration of Love, yet Arpasia did not take it in that sense, but believed that he said so only to expresse his esteem, so that she answered him very civilly: At first, he was angry she did not understand him; but in a moment after, he was glad of it: So that after severall obliging expressions on both sides, they parted. But Madam, whilst these things passed thus, Protogenes having observed, that Astidamus did not behave himself towards Arpasia as he ought, he spake very sharply unto him, and charged him to carry himself better, & to prepare himself to marry her very shortly: For (said he) whether the King of Assyria consent or not consent, you shall marry her. Astidamus who had spirit enough, and was really resolved to betray Cleonide, and marry Arpasia, told Protogenes very confidently, that he did not think he was obliged to live with one whom he was to marry in that way of Gallantry, as if he Courted one whom he knew not whether he should marry her or not: but be assured Sir (said hee) that I shall obey you when you please. But Madam, be pleased to know, that a Servant unto Protogenes who was acquainted with Alcianipe, having heard this Conference, he told it unto her, and she made it known unto Meliantes, who was extremely perplexed at it. Was ever misery equal unto mine? (said he unto Phormion, who since told it unto me) For all other Lovers are commonly miserable, either because they are hated, or because they have Rivals loved: And yet most certain it is, Arpasia doth esteem me, I have no Rival: and he who pretends to marry her without a dram of Love, is hated: And yet for all this, I am the most miserable of men, since I am like to see the man whom I do hate, enjoy the person whom I do love, and to betray and forsake my Sister: So that by this means he will blast both my love & my honour, if I do not give a check unto his designs: and yet it is not an easie matter to effect: For Astidamus will obey Protogenes; Protegenes will have him to marry Arpasia: And Gabrias desires it as much as he, unless I do let him see the treachery of Astidamus towards Cleonide, and Arpasia.

But shall I my selfe publish the intelligence which he holds with my Sister before I am sure I can oblige him to marry her? And can I have the confidence to quarrell with him for casting off my Sister, when as I did the like to his? Truth is, I am not so inconstant as he is, because I loved her lesse; but this excuse is not sufficient to excuse me. What shall I do my dear Phormion (said hee unto him) Truly (replied his friend) I am as much to seek for advice as your selfe: But the best Councell I can give, is, to overcome your passion, as Astidamus hath his. For he is in Love with Cleonide, yet is resolved to marry another: Therefore I pray Sir, call Argelyse into your memory and heart, and quit Arpasia, as he hath Cleonide. As for the interest of Cleonide, unless you knew how to force Astidamus to marry her, it were better to smother all reports of her intelligence with him, than to divulge it. But that cannot be, replied Meliantes, since I had never known of it but by Alcianipe, who never knows any thing that may wound anothers reputation, but she tells it to a hundred severall persons; and I am told, that if she do know of any such businesse, if company come not in quickly unto whom she may impart it, shee will goe out and seek them. Also I am credibly informed, that if she be sick, nothing will sooner cure her, nor make her quit her Bed, than to have some such tittle-tattle or other to carry unto some whom shee thinks it will please or spight; for she transacts by severall motives, though all equally ill: and can you thinke she will not tell all men the same she hath told me? Yes yes, Phormion, Alcianipe is silent in nothing but in Commendations: Nay perhaps she will draw out an innocent correspondency to become a great Crime: And to be sincere with you, though Astidamus did not betray my sister, yet Page 44 should I hate him no lesse than I do, it is enough that he is likely to marry Arpasia, to make me ruine him if I can. But Sir (said Phormion) Arpasia does not so much as know that you do love her. She knows that I do visite her, and that I admire her (replied he) and I hope that ere long she will know that I love her, though I never tell her, for my passion is too violent to be smothered: and she can not choose but see it. All I have to do, is to poison Astidamus, in the opinion of Arpaspas father by acquainting him with his love of Cleonide, and by producing such circumstances as shall make Astidamus appear what he is, to wit, an impostor, and perfidious; I perceive by your looks (added he) that you thinke it strange I should give such terrible names unto Astidamus, having an opinion that I do merit them as well as he: But Phormion be not deceived, for if there be any equality in our crims it is not in our proceedings, when I thought my self in love with Argelise, it was because I knew not then what Love was, but now I know, that it was only esteem and friendship, which I professed unto her, and if I did quit her, it was, because a most violent passion forced me unto it, and she is beholding unto me for doing all I could to keep my heart from her, but the case is not the same with Astidamus, for he is deeply in love with Cleonide, and maugre this love he quits her for his interest of fortune.

Moreover, he is so unjust, not only to forsake her, but to betray her by dissembing his inconstancy, least she should hinder him in his designe of marrying Arpasia but tis far otherwise with me, for if Argelise were heer, I should resent her misfortunes as my own, Ah Meliantes (said Phormion and interrupted him) you say so, because Argelise is not at Alfenes: for I assure you, it is a greater difficulty than you imagin; for any brave man to tell a woman whom once he seemed to love that now he does not love her; and if she were here at this present, you would be driven into an extream perplexity. No doubt of it (replied he,) but that I should be extremely ashamed at the sight of her, yet for all that, rather than betray her as Astidamus doth my sister, I would discover my weakness unto her, I would confess my fault, & ask a pardon for it: But since I perceive you will not give me any advise. I will follow the dictates of my own thoughts. So Meliantes after he had studied a while, went out, and went to give Cleonide a visit with whom he had often been, as well as with all other Ladies of quality, in Alfenes. Yet he could not speak with her so soon as he desired, because much company was with her aunt and her, but they being gon all, except one man who stayed about some business with the Lady of the house, he had all the liberty of talk, he could wish, and as soon as he was alone with Cleonide, he took out one of those Letters which heretofore she had writ unto him, and asked her if she knew the hand: Cleonide took it and began to read it, little thinking it to be of her own writing, but when she read a line, she knew it to be one which she sent unto her brother, at first, she looked seriously upon him, but he had an air so unressemblant, unto all his family, that not knowing why her brother should conceal himself, she did not think her self to be his sister, but imagined him to be only some freind unto her brother, I beseech you Sir, said she unto him, do you know him unto whom this Letter was written? if you do, pray tell me where he is, and why he gave it unto you? I shall satisfie you in all your demands (replied Meliantes) yes, and more, provided you will promise me not to speak a syllable of any thing I shall tell you, no not unto Astidamus, (added he, and looked earnestly upon her) At these words Cleonide blusht, and doing something about her head, purposely to hide her blushes, I do not wonder (said she unto him) that you should desire me to tell no body what you say, but I have reason to be offended at you, for particularizing Astidamus, and that you should speak of him, as if I could know nothing, but I must impart it unto him. All I can do at present for your satisfaction (replied Meliantes) is to assure you, that when I have told you all I have to say, you will so clearly see, that I have no intentions to offend you that you will repent your suspicion of it. But unjust Cleonide, (pursued he) the business is of such a nature, that you must be sure none come to interrupt us; and oblige you unto a private conference, I swear unto you by all that is sacred, that you will be the most miserable person of all your quality and sex, if you do not hearken unto me, and positively believe all that I shall say, when you have heard me.

Page 45 You express your self so very strangely, replied she, that though you should tell me nothing but sad stories, yet I must confess my curiosity such, that I cannot choose but hear you, and therefore if you please, we will walk into the garden, where we shall not be interrupted, for I will appoint if any come in, they shall be carried into my aunts chamber, with all my heart (replied Meliantes,) but first you must promise me not to speak a word unto Astidamus, of any thing I shall tell you; and indeed you must promise me most solemnly and seriously. If I do promise you to tell no body (answered Cleonide and still blushed) I do tacitely imply, that I will not tell Astidamus, and therefore why do you insist so peremptorily upon such a frivolous ceremony, which in my opinion is an affront put upon me: Nay, nay, never insist upon such niceties, (replied he) nor ruin your self upon imaginary punctilioes. Cleonide hearing Meliantes so plain, she began to be angry in good earnest, and would not give him audience; but since the same thing which angered her, did also swell her with curiosity, she surmounted her resentments and told Meliantes, that there was never any such League between Astidamus and her, she would promise him never to reveal what he should tell her.

After this, Meliantes took her by the hand, and carried her unto a seat in an Arbor; when they were set, Cleonide first began; well Meliantes (said she) I pray tell me who gave you that Letter which you shewed me? before I give you direct answer (replied he) I must most seriously protest unto you, that all I shall say unto you is as certainly true, as that you are my sister, is not more sure, nor more certain, that Astidamus intends to betray you; at these words Cleonide stood in amaze, her colour went and came a hundred times: First she looked upon Meliantes, then looked off him with abundance of shame. Sometimes she wished all he said were true, and sometimes desired all might be false; being vexed to the soul she should begin acquaintance with her brother, by such a shameful adventure. But at last, to clear her doubts, the names of Meliantes and Clidaris, are so unlike (replied she) that I could not take the one for the other, since names are not essentially fixed to the bearers, said he, but that they may shift them as they please, your reason is not at all convincing, but to come near the substance of the business, I will engage my self to shew you all the Letters which ever you write unto me, and more than that, I will tell you the substance of all that ever I write unto you, and to clear my self more manifestly unto you, I will write in your presence what you shall please, that you may compare my writing with those Letters which Clidaris wrote unto you, and so plainly see, that Meliantes and Clidaris are the same without more delay he pulled out of his pocket, both Pen, Ink, and Paper, and began to write some lines which he gave unto Cleonide, but she was more amazed than ever, when she found written, that if she would follow his counsel, she should never marry Astidamus: she saw enough by the hand, to assure her, he was her brother. But before she could recover out of her wonder, Meliantes told her so many particulars concerning her family, as put her out of all doubt, but to clear the matter more fully, she asked him how it could come to pass, the friend of Astidamus should write word that he had seen you at Samosates? Then Meliantes began to relate unto her, his travels into that place, and how it was his fortune to meet Gabrias and Arpasia. I beseech you (said Cleonide then) why did you change your name? and why would you not make your self known to me at first? your questions (dear sister) replied he, are of such importance, that I must not answer them until that after you have ingeniously confessed unto me, that Astidamus, is in love with you, that he hath promised you never to marry Arpasia, & that you do believe him: Alas, brother (said she and blushed) I am not able to confess such things of that nature: that you may no longer dissemble the matter (replied Meliantes) know, that I am not ignorant in any thing that hath passed betwixt you; and to instance in some, I do know, that you use to meet Astidamus in a garden of your friends, which joyne unto this, in which we are, especially since Arpasia came hither, & that it was there he swore a thousand false oaths unto you: and indeed I know of a most infallible certainty, that if you do not follow my counsells, he will marry Arpasia.

Moreover, to induce you unto an absolute confidence in me, I will trust you with the only secret of my soul and life, and acquaint you, that I am as much concerned Page 46 in this marriage as you are, for to tell you truly, I am in love with Arpasia in love so deeply, that if the life of Astidamus be dear unto you, you must help me to make him faithful unto you, and do as I shall direct you to hinder him from marrying her whom I do love and adore: for I do profess unto you, that if you do not, you will endanger either to see your brother kill your Lover, or your Lover kill your brother, think seriously upon what I say, and be confident that you have as great an interest as I have in the advice which I shall give you. You fill me so full of wonder, (replied Cleonide) that I know not what answer to return. The business is of such a near concernment (replied he) that you must answer, and that you may more sincerely open your self, I desire you to consider, that I do not offer to reprove you for your affection to Astidamus, for I have a strong confidence in your virtue, and I know experimentally, that love is not a thing voluntary, and I were unjust if I should expect more force from you than I have my self; but excusing your imbecilities, as I expect you should do mine, you must sincerely acquaint me with all the passages betwixt Astidamus and you, to the end I may force him to fidelity, and keep him from making me miserable; if you do not, I vow unto the Gods, that before you can see Astidamus, to tell him what I have said unto you, I will see him, and tell him such a story, as may become fatal to one of us: And therefore my dearest sister, I do conjure you by your own honour, & by the affection you have unto Astidamus to prevent both your own and my misery, and not to deny a thing, which I do know as certainly as you do your self. You presse me in so strange a manner, (replied Cleonide) that I have not power either to deny or confess what you ask; yet you must do the last of these (replied Meliantes) if you will preserve your own Honour, and your Lover, and not hinder the happiness of a Brother, who will be a debtor unto you for all his felicity, if you will but think upon your own.

After this, adding a thousand tender and obliging conjurations, unto what he had said before, Cleonide confessed that Astidamus had long loved her, and still told her every day, that he continued the same, and after the first ice was broken, she told Meliantes as much as he desired to know. But as a justification of her self she aggravated the Courtship and cares, which Astidamus had taken to win her heart, and told her brother, that he had written Letters unto her, every day: Meliantes pressed her to see his Letters, and so importunately, that she fearing if she should deny him, he would think them of another nature than they were, and knowing that they would rather justify than accuse her, she pulled two of them out of her pocket, the one received last night, the other in the morning, and gave them unto Meliantes, who opening them, did find in them as much as he could desire; and if my memory do not much fail me, they were to this effect following.

To the Incredible CLEONIDE.

Madam,

WILL you not believe me, when I promise and protest, that I do not love Arpasia, and that I love none but you? but it seems you are resolved to be as unjust as you are rigorous, in doubting the sincerity of my words. I beseech you, be not deluded by fallacious appearances; but be confidently persuaded, that I will never marry Arpasia and that I will eternally love the fair Cleonide.

ASTIDAMUS.

You may imagine Madam, that Meliantes was not a little glad he had got this Letter into his hands; and in hopes to find another, as pertinent to his purpose, he opened it in all haste and found these words.

Page 47

To the Unjust CLEONIDE.

Madam,

I Wonder why you should not, but I am sure you may believe me when I protest, that Protogenes with all his power over me, shall not be able to make me perfidious, unto my dear Cleonide: Believe it, that either by the King of Assyria's means or my Mothers, who will be shortly here, and I will break off my marriage with Arpasia, and if you be as constant as I am faithful, we will love one another for ever.

ASTIDAMUS.

Though this second Letter was as fit as the first, to be laid in the dish of Astidamus, yet it did not please Meliantes so well as the first, because it mentioned the arrival of his Rivals mother, and because he made no question but Argelise would come with her. So that this news brings spurs to hasten on his designe of preventing Astidamus, he was resolved not to restore these two Letters unto his Sister, but to keep them, and shew them unto Arpasia, that she might shew them unto Gabrias, and so break off the marriage: Not but that he knew all that Astidamus said in his Letters was false, and he mentioned the coming of his Mother to his marriage, the better to delude her.

But after a tumultuous reflection upon all these things, in stead of restoring the Letters to his Sister, he put them in his pocket, and told her, that upon them depended both his good fortune, and hers. At first Cleonide opposed his designe; no no sister (said Meliantes) I will not restore them, for they are so necessary to preserve Astidamus for you, and yet Arpasia for me, that I should do both you, and my self very ill service if I should part with them. For as I told you before, Astidamus intends to deceive you, and he positively promised Protogenes, yesterday to marry Arpasia whensoever he pleased, and he carries fair with you, least you should obstruct his marriage with her. After this, Meliantes, making a more exact relation of all passages unto her, he told her to bring her to his mind, that there was no course to be taken but one of these two, either he must fight with Astidamus, or else break off his marriage with Arpasia by making use of these Letters.

Cleonide liking the last of these ways better than the first, she consented he should have the letters, after his promise that he would shew them unto none but Gabrias and Arpasia, and it was her wisest course to consent, for she knew not how to hinder him. However, he made her promise him, not to discover unto her Lover who he was, until his marriage with Arpasia, was broken off. And he did so plainly demonstrate unto her, that she would ruin her self and honour, if she did not prove faithful unto him, and likewise that she would put the life of Astidamus in danger, that he did not fear, but shee would keep promise with him; so that parting upon mutual promises of fidelity, Cleonide stayed in the garden contemplating upon the adventure.

And Meliantes went unto Arpasia, with intention to shew her the Letters of Astidamus; and indeed, as soon as they could talk in private together, she gave him an opportunity of shewing them unto her, and asked him, what news from Alcianipe? he having no mind to let her know, that Cleonide was his sister, least she should think he had some ends in persecuting Astidamus, he let her go on in her opinion, that he knew all from this woman, so that he gave her the Letters to read, the hand she knew; but Madam, Arpasia read them with different thoughts, for they made her both glad and angry: And her aversion to Astidamus, did so increase, that Meliantes had been very happy if she had loved him, as much as she hated Astidamus. I protest Meliantes, (said she unto him) the infidelity of Astidamus unto Cleonide makes me hate him more than his insensibility unto me doth, and I should sooner pardon him for slighting me, than for betraying her. For my particular (replied Meliantes) I am not of your mind, for I think the greatest crime of Astidamus, is his not loving you, and next to it, his infidelity unto Cleonide; Page 48 but to see you and not to love you is a crime incredible: Could it ever be imagined that a lover of Cleonide, would be the husband of Arpasia? or could it enter into the heart of a man to marry Arpasia, and not love her? these are so far above my belief, that had not Astidamus given his insensibility under his own hand in those two letters, I could not have given any credit unto it.

I think it less strange (replied she) that he should be insensible towards me, than that he should be unfaithful unto Cleonide. But I beseech you Madam (said Meliantes) what course do you intend to take? I intend to shew these Letters unto my father, (replied she) and to tell him, that I will never marry Astidamus, and to open my heart unto you, as unto a man whom I dare trust, above any one in the world, I will assure you, that if he will force me to marry him, I shall not obey him, but I shall hope that since he is sensible of honour, he will have better thoughts. Doubtlesse, he knows that I do not love Astidamus, but I believe he does not know my reason for it, he thinks it is only an aversion in nature, which time and reason might surmount; but I am confident, when he shall see these Letters, he will be of another mind.

Perhaps madam, (said Meliantes) reasons of state will be his greatest consideration, No, said she, I hope to persuade him by these Letters, that Astidamus does not intend to marry me; and to put an open affront upon him, though Protagenes should press him to it: And I hope to persuade him to anticipate Astidamus, and break off with him, before he break off with us; in conclusion, Meliantes, I hope to transact the matter so, that it shall not be long of me, if the fair Cleonide do not marry Astidamus, and if I do not quit Alfenes, never to come into it again, the truth is (added she most obligingly) I shall depart with much sorrow, since I shall thereby loose you. Since I stay at Alfenes, only for the love of you, Madam, (replied Meliantes) I shall depart when you do, and if Fortune do not thwart my intentions, I think Madam, that I shall go whether you go; for you have so great a power over me; that I am not able to live far from you. If I have so much power over you (replied she) as you would make me believe I have, then tell me who you are, and acquaint me with the secrets of your heart, as I have you, with mine. I would the Gods, Madam, (said he) and looked fixedly upon her that you could guess them without my telling you: For the truth is, there is nothing in my soul which I would not have you know, yet I cannot without much pain tell you all the thoughts of my heart.

For Madam, I dare not discover all my imbecillities, I dare not tell you how I Love a most divine person without all hopes, I dare not for my life aggravate all the miseries which this passion hath caused me to endure, especially unto you Madam, whose actions are all guided by solidity of reason, not but that the person whom I adore, hath so many excellencies, as will well excuse all my imbecillities, For she is beauty in the very abstract, her wit transcends all capacities, she hath virtue & goodness in the superlative degree, & she doth a little esteem me, but for all this Madam, I dare not be so bold as to tell you of my passion. The worst is (replied Arpasia not suspecting his love to her) I have heard you say, that one can't be in love, but one must be miserable also, and therefore for my own interest, I must needs grieve for you, since it is not likely we shall be long together in one place. However added she, not giving him time to answer her) since the person whom you adore, hath so much Beauty, Wit, Virtue, Goodness, and Esteem of you, I cannot see you are much to be pitted: I should not indeed be very unhappy (replied he) if she did know without being offended, that I did love her, but since I never told her, I am in continual fears, least she should discover my passion; and yet at the same time I am grieved that she doth not divine it, and yet she must divine it, if she do know it (added he) for I never dare tell her that I do love her.

Meliantes spoke this with such a passionate air, as made Arpasia blush, and was constrained to apply it unto her self, and since she could not have any such thoughts without some appearance of it in her countenance, Meliantes saw that he was understood, so as fearing to say too much, and thinking he had said enough to make her suspect what he would have her know, he turned the discourse and began again to talk of Astidamus, Cleonide, and Gabrias, and so freed both her, and himself from Page 49 a non-plus: And this caused her not to be offended at this half declaration of his Love:

However, she was no sooner retired, But she did me the honour to impart all the passage unto me, and to tell me her opinion: which done, I told her that I had observed a hundred passages from Meliantes, which moved me to believe as she did, for truly (said I unto her) he hates Astidamus, only because he loves you, and he hates him in such a manner, as persuades me that his condition is worthy to be his rival. As for his quality (replied Arpasia) I doubt much less of it, than of his love. For all the thoughts of his soul are so noble, and there is something so high in all his proceedings, that I am most confident his quality is great; but for all that Niside (said she unto me) I must look upon him only as a friend which fortune gave me, and which she will quickly take from me, and I ought to be well satisfied, if fate will only keep me from marrying Astidamus.

After this, Arpasia changing discourse, we talked of nothing, but what she should say the next morning unto Gabrias: And indeed, as soon as she awaked, and had dressed her self, she went unto her father, unto whom she addressed her self with so much Prudence and Respect, that after he had read the Letters, and knowing the hand, he seemed to consent, that she should not marry him, who writ them, yet he told her, that to break off with a specious pretence, it was expedient to stay until the messenger which Protagenes and he had sent unto Babylon, was returned, because in all probability the King of Assyria would not approve of this marriage, and would give a pretence both unto Protagenes and him, not to proceed unto a conclusion of marriage; though they were once resolved upon it, whether the King did consent unto it or no. Daughter (said he unto her) I am confident that as soon as Protagenes shall see these two Letters, he will confess you have reason to be against your marriage with Astidamus, and if our other interests will not unite us without this alliance; I shall break off with him when it is convenient time.

In the mean time, it is policy to dissemble as he doth, until the time be ripe, and fit to testify our resentments: For the truth is, Protagenes is master of Alfenes, and if I should go imprudently to work, he might make his peace with the King of Assyria when he pleased, by delivering me up unto him.

This speech of Gabrias unto Arpasia, seeming reasonable, she thanked him for it, and expressed her self in the most tender and obliging Language she could devise, to confirm him in his opinion. So that not daring to presse him unto a restitution of the Letters, because he said, that he would shew them unto Protagenes, when it was fit time, she left them in his hands and went unto her Chamber with much satisfaction: and yet she had no great cause; for he pleased to know Madam, that Gabrias spoke so unto her, only to amuse her, and keep her from divulging her resentment, of ill treating Astidamus, For Gabrias having a full design to be revenged upon the King of Assyria, his mind and considerations ran only upon that, and not the satisfaction of Arpasia, so that intending to accomplish this marriage, he sent to Meliantes, and desired him to come and speak with him; who coming in all haste, he found him in his closet, holding the two Letters in his hand.

To testify unto you (said Gabrias unto him) how I esteem your Wisdom and friendship, I will trust you with the greatest secret of my family, and try if it be possible to make you side with that party which I am raising against the King of Assyria.

After this, Gabrias aggravated all his causes of complaint which he had against that Prince, then told him of the Treaty which he had with Protagenes, acquainted him, that the marriage of Arpasia was concluded upon, only for that reason, and told him all that Arpasia had told him before, and all her answers; But you Meliantes (said he unto him) being a man of understanding, I know will easily conceive that I answered my daughter as I did, only to gain time, for it were a gross absurdity, to break off with Protagenes, because Astidamus loves Cleonide, and is not in love with my daughter: For the marriages of persons of her quality are to be made upon solid grounds, never insisting upon such trifles as conduce nothing to the establishment of families, And though Astidamus do love Cleonide, and not Arpasia, no matter, for his mind may change; and though it do not, it is but according Page 50 to that order, which Nature and Custom hath established; for very few husbands are Lovers of their wives. And therefore since Astidamus hath courage and spirit enough and can serve to execute, my revenge, Arpasia must resolve to marry him yet since I desire that Astidamus would apply himself unto her rather by fair means than by my absolute authority, I have made choice of you to persuade Astidamus unto a little more compliance with her, and that he may see how he is obliged unto me, for my discretion in the knowledge that I have of his Love unto Cleonide, shew him these two Letters which I put into your hands. In saying so, Gabrias gave Meliantes the Letters, who seeming to read them, as if he had never seen them before, afterwards told Gabrias, that since Astidamus, had promised Cleonide, never to marry Arpasia, he could not believe it was in his power to persuade him to live better with her: Nay nay, never think so, said Gabrias, though Astidamus promised Cleonide never to marry Arpasia, yet he promised Protagenes to marry her when ere he pleased. And indeed, to discover the secret of the business unto you, I must tell you, that the man who was sent unto the King of Assyria is already returned, although it be not published, because a supposed answer of that Prince must be contrived, as if he had consented unto the marriage, although he did not; and I must tell you also, that as soon as the mother and sister of Astidamus are arrived, the marriage is to be celebrated. Therefore in this Interim which will not be long, I would have you tell Astidamus, that I am acquainted with his being in love with Cleonide, and that my daughter knows of it also: For since I do know of an infallible certainty, that although he do love Cleonide, yet he will marry Arpasia, I am persuaded that to avoid her persecution after marriage, he will strive with himself and break with Cleonide sooner then he would, if he thought that this gallantry was not known, either to me or my daughter; tell him that I will carefully conceal it from Protagenes, provided he will apply himself to appease Arpasia, and tell him on the other side, that if he will not do as he ought, I will discover him both unto Protagenes, and all the world

I leave you to imagine Madam, how Meliantes relished this employment, whether he considered himself as the Lover of Arpasia, or as the brother of Cleonide: And yet he was forced to accept of it, least Gabrias should bestow it upon another who would stickle in the business more than he would; therefore he promised Gabrias to obey his commands, yet he would not persuade him to expose Arpasia to so much misery, as to marry Astidamus, since she had a most invincible aversion to him.

But at last, Meliantes seeing he could prevail nothing with him, he left him, and went away with more sorrow then he was able to undergo: Understanding that much company was with Arpasia, he was in no fit tune to enter; but he went unto Cleonide, whom he found alone, to ask her whether she had seen Astidamus the night before, in the place where she was used to meet him? Alas brother (said she unto him) I have seen him but too often; for since you have opened my eyes I have seen his infidelity so clear in this, that I make no question of it: It was but yesterday that he promised me not to marry Arpasia, but he spoke more faintly than usual: and he did so harp upon the imperious humour of Protagenes, That I know he prepares himself for obedience: Truth is, dear Brother, Astidamus is a most perfidious man, one who hath stolen Arpasia from you, and will take his heart from me, unless you find some means to prevent your misfortune and mine: He told me yesterday (added she) that his Mother and his Sister would perhaps arrive to-morrow: but he feared extremely, that his Mother would not be able to oppose the Marriage, as he hoped and wished. How (said Meliantes) will Argelyse be at Alfenes to-morrow? if so, I must have recourse unto the most extreme remedies.

Cleonide surprized at her Brothers speeches, asked him why he said so? But Meliantes not being willing to tell her the Cause, did say that his sorrows were so great, that he knew not what he said: so that after about a quarter of an hours stay, he returned to Arpasia, to see if the company was gone: and understanding that there was none but Alcianipe, two other Ladies, and a man of good account in Alfenes, named Merosus, he thought they would depart presently, and therefore he entred, but he was deceived; for Alcianipe was in such a Page 51 talkative humour that day, as he thought she would never give over. Not but that Arpasia did civilly expresse her self to take no pleasure in detraction: Yet since she imagined that Meliantes knew of the gallantries of Astidamus only from her, therefore she endured her with more patience then she would, if she had not thought that it was by her means that her Marriage with Astidamus was to be broken off.

Moreover, since the Language of Gabrias had filled her full of joy, Meliantes found her as pleasant as he was sad: and she exposed her self unto Raillery with Merosus and Alcianipe. But Meliantes spoke not a word all the while, and was so reserved, that Arpasia took notice of it, and imagined that her suspicions of his being in Love with her, were not ill grounded: so that after Alcianipe, Merosus, and all the rest of the Ladies were gone, she avoided talking in private with him, as much as she could. And to that end she called all her women one after another: but Meliantes having business of concernment to impart unto her, beseeched her to let him have an hours Audience, and that presently: For Madam (said he unto her, and sighed) I assure you it imports all the happiness of your life that you do hear me, and that immediately. Arpasia knowing that Meliantes had some cross adventure or other to tell her, she changed colour, and desired him to acquaint her what misfortune had of late happened? So then hasting to tell her all that Gabrias had told him, least any should come in to interrupt them, he acquainted her in few words with all the Conference he had with her Father, and with so many signes of sorrow in his Countenance, as it was plainly to be seen that the interest of Arpasia did nearly concern him. How Meliantes (said she) is my Father so inhumane as to make me a sacrifice unto his Revenge? Can he find a heart to make mee the most miserable woman upon Earth, onely to satisfy his ambition? Would he marry me unto a man who can betray the best of women? Can Astidamus quit Cleonide whom he loves to obey Protagenes? and must I marry Astidamus who loves me not, to obey a Father? and yet Religion bids me not disobey him, although all my Prayers and my tears cannot move him.

How's this Madam (replied Meliantes hastily) can you ever find a heart to marry Astidamus? Questionlesse I shall sooner find a heart to dye (replied she) and yet I think I shall resolve upon it, rather than incur the shame of disobeying such a Father as Gabrias: and yet all remedies must first be tried: and I can't tell whether it would be expedient to acquaint Cleonide with the infidelity of her Lover, to the end, that she using her endeavours to prevent being betrayed, she may prevent my being miserable also. Alas Madam, (replyed Meliantes) that is already done, and to no purpose, why (replyed Arpasia,) hath Alcianipe spoke unto Cleonide, no Madam, (answered he) but I have spoke unto her my self, and since it concernes you as well as my self, that you know who I am, be pleased to know Madam, that I am Cleonides brother. Are you Cleonides brother? (replyed Arpasia with much astonishment) are you he, of whom the friend of Astidamus gave so noble a character? Yes Madam, (replyed he) I am the unfortunate Clidaris. under the name of Meliantes, whom Cleonide never saw since she was two years old.

I am very glad (replyed she) that I was not mistaken, when I thought your quality suitable to your merit? also it joyes me that being Cleonides brother, it concerns you almost as much as me, that I do not marry Astidamus: When you shall know me, well Madam, replyed he, perhaps you shall see, that it concerns me more than you; and that though Cleonide were not my sister, yet my concernment would be the same, For truly Madam, not to disguise my self and my soul any longer, I must tell you that I became your captive in speaking of the conquests of Sesostris, the very first day, that I had the honour to see you.

Yes Madam, the very first minute of your sight, was the first minute of my passion; and I have ever since loved you in such a respective manner, that you need not be offended if I assume so much boldness to tell you of it, in such a time when I would not have you attribute all I shall do against Astidamus, unto the Interest of my sister.

I am in such a miserable condition already (replyed Arpasia) that you should Page 52 not speak thus unto me, and deprive me of the consolation which I had in opening my heart unto you Why Madam (said he) will you shut up your heart from me, because I give you my own? and will you not be still my friend, because I love you Truly Madam, if so, I must needs say, you are both unjust and Rigorous: For Madam, my affection unto you is not incompatible with your virtue; since I ask nothing of you at present, but only that you will give me leave to love you, and that I may oppose my self against the designs of Astidamus, I have such a pretence as that you need not be seen to have any share in it; and if I be not the most mistaken man in the world, I will prevent your marrying him, without putting you to the necessity of disobeying Gabrias, though all this be very advantageous to me, (replyed she) yet though you have offended me, I would not have you take any course that may prove fatal unto either of you, and I had rather be the wife of Astidamus, than be the cause of any ones death, I would not hazard the life of Astidamus, much more yours. Moreover, (added she) to testifie unto you, that my esteem and amity is very great, since it can subsist after a declaration of love, I will pardon your boldness upon condition that hereafter you will not speak unto me, but under the notion of a friend, and as Meliantes.

Yet Madam, I beseech you (replyed he) Let Clidaris hope that he shall have a favourable acception from you, whensoever things are in such a condition, that he may let Gabrias know what thoughts he hath of you. I will permit him to hope, (replyed she) that if he can oblige my father to be as favourable to him, as he is unto Astidamus, that then, I say, I will not be so averse to him, as I am unto that perfidious Lover: And more than this Meliantes do not move me unto, unlesse you desire I should break quite off with you; though all this be almost nothing (replyed he) yet I shall be satisfied with your goodness, provided you will give me leave to tell you that I do love you with a more fervency than ever any did; that never Lover suffered more than ever I have, nor was ever any love more violent, and more solid both, than mine to you.

For believe it Madam, I love you with a certainty never to leave off loving you, and I love you without the contribution of any hopes, and without any complacency from you to increase it, since you did not so much as suspect that I was in Love with you.

And the love that flames in my soul having its fewell rather from the stars, than from reason, so that nothing can quench it, but must not be extinguished, except in my grave, I beseech you therefore admit of it; and let all I shall do against Astidamus, have a favourable reception from you. As Meliantes was saying this, Astidamus with three others entred into Arpasias chamber, so as silence being forced upon both, the talk must of necessity change; and Astidamus being that day in a pleasant humour, and moreover, having a design to marry Arpasia, he resolved to change his way of behaviour towards her, and to win upon her mind, he applied him unto her, and every one with all imaginable agreeableness; but as I remember, I told you before how he passed from one subject unto another, without arguing any thing to the bottom, so I may now very well say, that within the compass of one houre he talked of a hundred severall subjects: For he had up, not only all the news at Babylon, but also all the passages at Alfenes, he talked of every thing hee did that day he related what was spoken, in all the places where he had been• and he asked Arpasia what she had been doing, then did he chide Meliantes for his silence: afterwards he talked of musick and of painting, and brought in so many severall things, that one of the company taking notice of this great variety, did hint it into others by way of commending Astidamus, for (said he) there is nothing in the world more tedious, then begin in company with such people as dwell upon the first subject they begin to speak upon, and do so rip up the very botome of a business, that for a whole afternoon together, they will never change discourse, for since talk should be free and natural; and every one in the company to have an equal Liberty of changing as they think good, it is a grosse absurdity to stop the mouthes of any one, or to interrupt them.

For my part, said Meliantes very faintly) I do not understand your rule to be generall, for I do know some persons who can make much better diversion in Page 53 talking upon one subject, than in relating all the novelties of the World. If you speak of Love unto any person (replyed Astidamus) I think you have good reason not to change discourse; and yet unlesse you paint your passion with variety of colours, you will but tyre the person and your self too: Those who know how to love (replyed Meliantes) are not so soon weary, as others who know not; And Love hath this peculiarity unto it self, as it doth so sweetly take up the minds of those it doth possess, that silence often is a diversion; and two persons in Love, provided they may be together, will sit, and gaze, and never be weary, though they speak not a word unto each other.

However it be, (said Astidamus) I love variety in all things, variety of flowers in a meadow does very well (said Arpasia, in a languishing tone) but I do not love it in other things; and whether it be out of slowness or barrenness of wit, I know not, I use to talk long upon a subject which pleaseth me.

After this, Meliantes driving the business a little further, he moved Astidamus to answer him somewhat tartly, so as if Arpasia had not carried her self very discreetly, they had quarrelled in her presence, and yet they parted very civilly, and every one went home with different thoughts. Arpasia for her part was much disquieted, for since she had concluded nothing with Meliantes, she was afraid least he should take some violent course; and the more, because she knew he had no other way to break off her marriage; and because she saw most perfectly that he was in love with her, so that calling me into her closet, she acquainted me with the cause of all her sorrowes, she told me what Gabrias said unto Meliantes; and all that Meliantes had said unto her, both of his birth and passion, and afterwards she did aggravate her misfortunes with so many sighs, tears, and significative expressions, that she inspired me with all her sorrowes, yet Madam, (said I unto her to comfort her) you have this advantage, that Meliantes is both Cleonides brother, and your Lover: Doubtless it is (replyed she) to prevent Astidamus from marrying me; but Niside, it is an advantage which much disquiets me, for I esteem Meliantes more than to wish his ruin in my safety, and I esteem him more than to desire that his esteem should be seconded by a greater obligation. Since Meliantes is of so good a quality, (replyed I) you need not fear being obliged unto him: and if by breaking off your marriage with Astidamus, he should come to marry you I see no reason you have to complain against your fortune. Not so hasty, good Niside, (said she unto me) let us entertain no such ill grounded hopes, Meliantes doubtless hath as many charms both of soul and body, as any man in the world; yet for all that, though I conceive well enough of him as a friend, yet I know him not well enough to wish he were my husband; though I know very well he loves me, and though I have a very particular esteem of him, and since I know my self to be most unfortunate, I dare not wish it, least I should wish something to my own dis-advantage.

Whilst Arpasia was thus reasoning upon the matter, the soul of Meliantes was restlessly unsatisfied, for knowing that Astidamus was resolved to marry Arpasia, that Gabrias would force his daughter to obey him, and that she, malgré her repugnancy, had a disposition unto it, he saw that there was no remedies against his miseries, but such as were most violent.

Moreover, knowing of a certainty that Argelise would come, he foresaw, misery upon misery, and knew not how to untwist this ravelled clod of fortune: So that after he had passed over a whole night without sleep, and without imparting his inquietudes unto Phormion because he thought him too wise to give such violent counsell, as that which he gave himself, he got up in all haste, and without any with him but a page, he went to the place where he knew Astidamus used to walk in the mornings, who lodging on that side of the town towards the Lake, he went every morning to take the fresh air, at such an houre, when men of his age have least to do, because it was no time for visits, nor a time when the Ladies go into the Temple.

But Meliantes being there very early, Astidamus was not yet come; so as he had time enough to examine what he had to do; but the more he examined the present condition of his soul, the lesse alteration he found in his resolution. Think well with thy self Meliantes, (said he to himself, as he told me since) consider Page 54 what thou art about; Astidamus is brother unto Argelise, unto whom thou art obliged; whom thou doest esteem, for whom thou hadst a kind of amity which thou didst think to be love, and so did that lovely but unfortunate Lady, think also: content thy self therefore with being perfidious, and do not quarrell with one who is so dear unto her. But alas, (said he, and reprehended himself) how can I consider Astidamus only as Argelises brother, since he is to marry Arpasia, and betray Cleonide? yet as for this last crime, I should be so just as to pardon him, since I am guilty of the same my self; but for the other, I am not able to endure it: No no, I am not able to endure that Astidamus should ever marry Arpasia; and since I cannot prevent it, unless I take some violent course, I must resolve upon it, and put it in execution with all boldness and constancy.

As he was in this mind, Astidamus appeared, having none with him, but one page also, so that going towards him, he saluted him, to the end their Pages should take no notice: After which Astidamus began to speak; how comes it to passe Meliantes, (said he unto him) that I should meet you in a walk which I thought had been frequented by none but my self? You meet me here, (replyed hee) because I came to seek you, and tel you, that I have a business of importance to impart, which I believe will be agreeable to your Minde; For considering the thoughts which I know you have of Cleonide, I make no doubt but you will be glad to know that I am her brother, and that you will make use of those expedients which I shall advise you unto, by not marrying Arpasia whom you love not, and by marrying Cleonide, whom I know you do love.

How (replyed Astidamus, much astonished) are you Clidaris who passed by Salmosates? Yes, (replyed he) I am the same Clidaris of whom you received an advantageous Character, and who comes to summon you unto a performance of your promise unto my sister, Not that she is my intelligencer, but since the generall vogue of the Town is, that you are going to marry Arpasia, I should be very glad (for my own honours sake, which links me with hers in this business) to understand from your own mouth, the truth of your intentions.

But to the end you may not believe I assume a name which belongs not unto me (said he, and shewed him the two Letters which he had written unto Cleonide) so here your own hand, which I could not have but from the hand of my sister, and answer me punctually unto what I shall ask you When I writ these two Letters unto Cleonide (replyed Astidamus sharply) I did intend to do what I writ, but now I see she doubts my promises that she sends to me for a more cleer manifestation, and that she hath concealed from me your being her brother, her infidelity <◇> all dis|pence with mine, nor ever was my engagement so great with Cleonide, that her reputation should be at stake, I loved her, and she allowed me, but never was any noise made of it in the world, and though it should be known I was in Love with her; and was not hated, yet would she not be dishonored by it, whether any know it or no, replyed Meliantes it is no matter, its enough I know it, to make me move you unto a performance of your promise which you made unto her.

I had performed it, (replyed Astidamus craftily) had she trusted unto my word, but now I do not think it fit to incense Protophenes, lose all my fortunes, and put an affront upon Gabrias and Arpasia, to satisfie a person, who hath put an affront upon me,

Will you not then marry Cleonide, (said Meliantes coldly) and do you intend to marry Arpasia? since reason requires I should, I will (replyed Astidamus) and I know not who or what can hinder me. Should I follow my own inclination (replyed Meliantes) my sword should force you to that, which the consideration of Justice will not. But a prevalent reason, best known to my self forbidding me to use that extreame until I be forced, I will acquaint you further. that I am no* only Cleonides brother, but also the Lover of Arpasia, so as though I could consent you should slight my sister, yet I cannot let you marry my mistress: And therefore having a double interest in the affair, I advise you to examine the matter, and resolve colligiously to do what becomes you, since as I thinke there is no great difficulty in it, for since you do not love Arpasia but do love Cleonide you may most easily satisfie both me, and your self.

Since I value my honour above all things (replied Astidamus sharply) I need Page 55 not spend more time in deliberation; and therefore let the difference be terminated by Combate, to let you see that it is not your sword can force me to keep promises, to that end let us send our servants further off: So these two Enemies began to fight with as much Courage as animosity: But striving to vanquish, and when they were ready to kill each other, a Coach full of Ladies, and many men on horse-back appeared very neer them: and they came so happily, that neither of them were wounded when they were forced to end their Combate.

But the wonder was, who should be in the Coach but the Mother of Astidamus, and Argelyse? So that the first object of this faire one was to see her Brother with a sword in his hand fighting against her pretended Lover, of whose infidelity she was ignorant. As soon as she saw them, she cryed out in testimony of her wonder and sorrows; so as being parted, they knew her voyce, and turned their heads to the place from whence the voyce came. Meliantes looking upon her, and she upon him, he was so ashamed to think she should know of his new passion, that he had much ado to endure her looks. Yet he saluted both her Mother and her very civilly: and asking pardon for his being found in that Condition with her Brother, he told her in two words, that it was an effect of his misfortune and misery which deserved pity.

In the mean while, Astidamus and Meliantes seeing much company come in, and their Pages appearing, they saw that they could not prevent their being carryed to the Town, from which they were not distant above two hundred paces: and in which they no sooner were, but Protogenes set Guards upon them, until he knew the cause of their Quarrell, and had seen Gabrias: For since Meliantes came with him, he thought it not expedient to do any thing in the business without him. You may imagine Madam, what a noise this Combate made in Alfenes, and in what a Condition all those persons were who had any interest in the businesse.

When Arpasia heard the newes, and thought upon the danger unto which Meliantes had exposed himselfe, and what a noyse this quarrell would make, shee was extreame troubled, she was afraid, lest they should think that she had contributed any thing to the Combate, also feared that this quarrell in lieu of breaking the Marriage, would hasten it. In the mean time, shee knew not how to be satisfied of the truth, but was forced unto patience, till time did satisfie her curiosity. On the other side, Cleonide was as angry both against her Brother, and against her Lover: She thought the first of these did not care for her, since he would kill a man, whom he knew she affected with much tendernes: Also shee thought that Astidamus did not love her, but was a most perfidious man, since he would kill her brother. So that being angry sometimes against one, and sometimes against another, she was in a most impatient desire to know more circumstances of the Combate. Astidamus for his part, he was not a little perplexed, for he stood in extreame feare of Protogenes, because his fortunes depended upon him, and therefore was extreame afraid lest he should be offended at his engagement with Cleonide; the love he bore unto her never troubled him, nor made him ashamed; and that esteem which he had of Arpasia made him loath she should know of his inconstancy and double dealing.

Meliantes for his particular was in a most restlesse condition, out of feare lest Arpasia should be offended at what he had done, and that he had told Astidamus how he was in Love with her: The presence of Argelyse was no small grieve and shame unto him, though he had some small Consolation out of a far-fetched hope that he should break off the Marriage of Astidamus with Arpasia. But as for Argelyse, she knew not what to thinke of the Combate between her Brother & Meliantes, & she was very diligent to find out the truth of the busines: And though Astidamus was under guard, yet she could speak with him, because she was not a person suspected. Argelyse then taking her Brother aside, whilst her Mother was with Protogenes, negotiating for a reconciliation of the businesse, she pressed him to tell her the cause of his quarrell with Meliantes: And Astidamus being willing to satisfie her, he began to relate his love unto Cleonide, his voyage unto Gabrias, his affection unto Arpasia, his renewing with Cleonide after his return, his fears of displeasing Protogenes if he should confesse his passion, and his ambitious design of forsaking Cleonide, and marrying Arpasia.

Page 56 Is it as the brother of Cleonide (said the impatient Argelyse and interrupted him) that Meliantes fought with you: Doubtless it is (replied he) and more, for he fought with me as the Lover of Arpasia. As the Lover of Arpasia? (sayd Argelyse and blushed) it is impossible. Since I had it from his own mouth (replied Astidamus) I need not doubt it. Is it possible brother (replied Argelyse) that Meliantes should love Arpasia, and fight with you rather as her Lover, than as Cleonides Brother? I am so certain of it (replied he) that you need not question it any further: But Sister (said Astidamus, and looked earnestly upon her) why doe you think it so strange that Meliantes should be in Love with Arpasia who is one of the greatest Beauties in the world? Did he perswade you whilst he was at Salmosates that he loved you? and have I the same interest of honour to be revenged upon him, as he pretends to have of me? I beseech you tell mee whether I conjecture right, as the alteration of your Countenance doth perswade me that I do. Speak, dear Sister (sayd hee) I conjure you to tell mee truly.

Alas dear brother, what would you have me tell you? said she, I would have you tell me the truth (replied he) but then I must hold my hand before my eyes when I tell it (replied she) I meane when I tell you, that Meliantes is perfidious, who perswaded me that he loved me, and told me that his chiefe designe in coming to Alfenes was to get your Love, but I perceive he hath changed his mind: yet I do not see what advantage I shall get by acquainting you with his infidelity, and my weaknesse: For truly brother, as long as you are resolved to forsake Cleonids for Arpasia, you cannot upbraid him that he should forsake me. 'Tis very true, replied Astidamus; but he hath not so much right to pretend unto the Love of Arpasia, as I have: And though I receive no other advantage from his fighting you, but that it will hinder him from being the Lover of Arpasia, yet that is very great, and you have reason to think your selfe happy in coming so opportunely to be revenged on him: Alas brother, said shee, you will be more revenged upon me than him, if you publish the innocent affection which I have unto that unfaithfull man. However, replied Astidamus, I must make him appeare as culpable as I am to Cleonide; and to that end I conjure you to acquaint me with all the testimonies of his affection which ever he gave unto you. Alas (said she and sighed againe) since I am not in a Condition to receive any, I will not remember them any more.

As they were thus in discourse, they were interrupted by several persons of quality who came in a Complement unto Astidamus after his Combate: So as Argelyse being forced to retire and hide her sorrows, Astidamus remained alone with them who came to visit him. But as soon as ever they were gone, he employ'd all his endeavours to get one of the Guards to carry a Letter unto Meliantes, by which he intimated unto him, that since he had begun a quarrell with him as he was the brother of Cleonide, and the Lover of Arpasia, he thought good to tell him from the brother of Argelyse, and from him that was to marry Arpasia, that he should endeavour to escape from his Guards the night following, as he hoped to do from his, to the end they might finish their Combate in a Place which he appointed, unlesse he would yeeld Arpasia to him, and marry Argelyse.

But Madam, this Letter was not delivered unto Meliantes; for since Protogenes caused him to be guarded more closely than Astidamus; the man who was to deliver this Letter unto Meliantes was stopped and searched by the Guards: and this Letter being found about him, he was carried unto Protogenes, when Gabrias and the Mother of Argelise and he were together. You may judg Madam, what disorder this Letter caused, for by it Protogenes knew that Astidamus was unfaithfull unto the Sister of Meliantes, and that Meliantes was unfaithfull unto the sister of Astidamus. Gabrias for his part, he saw more plainly than before, that his Daughter had good reason for her aversion against a man who did not love her: And the Mother of Argelise understood that the heart of her Daughter was more engaged than she imagined.

In the mean time, such an adventure as this was not to be kept secret, for the letter was read aloud by those who took the man which should have given it unto Meliantes: Two dayes were spent in the examination of the businesse, before any thing could be resolved upon: Such an universall report was spread over all Alfenes, that nothing else was talked of. You may imagine, that Alcianipe was as busie Page 57 as the busiest, in giving advice; and tumbling truths and lyes together, she composed a most strange history of all those persons. But Madam, it is fit I should tell you how sadly the fair Arpasia resented it, when she heard that Meliantes was accused of Infidelity to Argelise, though he was unfaithfull, only because he loved her.

However, she alwaies affirmed to me, that her sorrows proceeded only from resentments of esteem and freindship.

But Madam, (said I unto her) Since the infidelity of Meliantes is advantageous to you, me thinks he deserves to be excused, and that you should not be greived, especially since you are in good hopes not to marry Astidamus; and since it may so come to passe, that you may marry Meliantes, who is one of the best accomplished men in the world. Meliantes replied she, most certainly is a very excellent man, but since he can be unfaithfull, he can never be my Lover with any hopes of being loved, my friend indeed he may be, and under that notion, I can both pity and excuse him, but he must never pretend any further.

On the other side, Meliantes knowing that Arpasia did know of all his adventure with Argelise, and that Argelise knew of his love to Arpasia, he intreated two different things from Phormion, for he desired him to go and make excuses for him to her, unto whom he had been unfaithfull, and also unto her, who made him commit the infidelity.

Since those who guarded him, had orders to let Phormion come to him, because it was known he carried himself very moderately, he had the liberty to vent all the variety of his thoughts unto him. I beseech you dear friend (said he unto him) use all your Rethorick to sweeten the sharpness of Argelises mind, provided you mention nothing which may offend my love unto Arpasia; but when you talk with that divine person, who reigns Sovereign in my soul, imply all the faculties of your ingenuity so, that she may not deprive me of her esteem. Were Arpasia a common person, I should hope she would thank me for my infidelity, but knowing her as I do, I fear she will suspect my passion; tell her then I beseech you, who knows my heart, that I am less unfaithfull than she imagines, since I was never in love with Argelise, so far as she beleived: Yet do not insult upon that unhappy person, but protest unto Arpasia, that though Argelise was first my affectionate freind, yet she was not my first Love, tell her my heart deceived me, when I thought I was in love with Argelise, and that the young experience which I had in that passion, made me tell harmless lyes, when I assured Argelise that I loved her, since it is a most certain trueth, that the power of Arpasias charmes hath perfectly taught me that I was never really in love with any, until I first saw her, and since it is so, I ought not to be looked upon as an unfaithfull man, whose love must be suspected.

Phormion would have endeavoured to avert him from the Love of Arpasia, but he was not able.

In the mean time, this wise and faithfull friend, who in that little time he had been in Alfenes, had gotten a Language which was not naturall unto him, did very exactly execute that employment which Meliantes did put upon him, but he found Argelise so chollerick, that do what he could, he was not able to qualifie her incensed spirit. As for Arpasia, he found her very sweet and civil, and she told him, that she thought her self much obliged unto Meliantes, for hazarding his life in her behalf, though she could have wished he had not applied such violent remedies, but she desired him to tell Meliantes from her, that she wished, he would not any longer continue obstinate in loving her, since he did but loose his Labour. Then Phormion for all that, did perswade her withall the reasons which his friend had furnished him withall, but she told him again so resolutely, that she would never entertain a Lover whom she could suspect of inconstancy, that he plainly saw, Meliantes had no hopes.

On the other side Cleonide seeing infallibly, that Astidamus forsook her out of self interest, she was so incensed against him, as she declared that though he should return again unto her, yet he should return in vain, for she would never marry a man, who had more ambition in his heart than love.

This example of Cleonides generosity, wrought so upon the heart of Argelise, that she being out of hopes Meliantes would ever become her slave again, she said Page 58 as much as Cleonide did, so as the resentments of these three persons, being quickly known unto Protogenes, and Gabrias, they did not think the business so difficult to be composed; yet were they very sorry to see, that the marriage of Arpasia and Astidamus could no be consummated; but since they still united their interests against the King of Assyria, they made the best of this adventure they could: So that <◇◇> Meliantes and Astidamus, were almost equally culpable to each other, and their sisters, and that Cleonide and Argelise, would not pretend unto their Lovers, nor Arpasia, unto Meliantes; they conceived that there was nothing else to be done, but to prevent a second combat: And imploying the perswasions of all their friends, these two enemies did seem to yeild unto the desires of their freinds purposely to be rid of their guards; and they conented to imbrace each other, promising to quarrell no more: But for all that, hating one another with an inveterate mallice, as they imbraced each other, there passed a reciprocall challenge between them, and they carried it so cunningly, that none perceived it.

They both went out of Alfenes the night following, and fought the next mornjng by break of day, where none was present to part them, Meliantes wounded Astidamus very dangerously, and disarmed him, so that seeing he could not enter into Alfenes, after this combat, considering the condition of his enemy, he retired, after he had put him into the hands of his page, who waited upon him, and that he sent his own page unto Phormion, to acquaint him with the place where he would stay for him, giving him a Letter also for Arpasia.

Thus Madam, immediately after this fair one understood, that Astidamus was brought in much wounded, this page found an opportunity to give her his Masters Letter, wherein was writ these words, if my memory fail me not.

To the Fair ARPASIA.

Madam,

I Have oft heard say, that one may treat a persidious Lover ill; but I cannot think it just, to use a faithfull Lover so, I conceive Madam, that Argelise cannot hate me without shee be unjust; and I conceive you cannot hate me unless you be cruell. However, though perhaps you beleive not this, yet I cannot choose but conjure you to remember, that had it not been for my love to you, you had been the wife of Astidamus, and beleieve, that in what part of the world soever I am, I shall be eternally your Lover, and shall be more faithful under the name of Meliantes, than ever I was under that of Clidaris.

I being with Arpasia when she read this Letter, I observed she could not read it without some disorder, yet shee would not answer it, only intreated Phormion when he came to bid her adue, to tell his friend, that she was so just as never to forget her Obligations to him, conjuring him to think of her as a person, who could not be any more than his friend.

But Madam, after Phormion had met with Meliantes, since it was easy to fore|see, that Gabrias would very shortly return, he would not go very far from Alfenes, purposely to know the passages there, and being resolved to speak with Arpasia say what Phormion could, he would meet Arpasia upon the way.

In the mean time, whilst we were at Alfenes, Gabrias was much perplexed; for since Meliantes did first come with him, and since it was he who presented him unto Protopenes, this man greiving to see his nephew in danger of death, pretended that Gabrias must needs know where Meliantes was, and that it was fit he should inform him.

Gabrias for his part, being perswaded, that this Duell was fought without any foul play, and with equall advantage, and thinking it against the Laws of honour to pursue Meliantes, he told Protopenes, that he knew not where he was: But though he did know, he would not tell him, unless his thoughts were better than he saw them. So as growing insensibly very bitter one against another, though their Page 59 interests required an union, they parted upon ill terms, and much animosity one against another.

But I do verily beleive, the black tongued Alcianipe did blow the bellows of their anger very much, for she divulgd a report, that Protopenes had a design to discover the intentions, which Gabrias had of taking part with Ciaxares; and to make his own peace with the King of Assyria, intended to send both him and Arpasia unto Babylon, and at the very same time, she told others, that Gabrias thin|king to betray Protopenes, had secretly conveyed some souldiers into Alfenes, and that Arpasia did set on Meliantes to fight with Astidamus, but the wonder was, that she thinking to tell a lye did tell a truth, for she affirmed, that Meliantes was to meet Arpasia? upon the high way, as she travelled. Moreover, she said, that she was sure there was most intimate affection between them: Again, she would not allow that this duel was fought with fair play, and vented such invectives, both against Cleonide and Argelise, that her venomous tongue did become odious, unto all that had any interest in these two Ladies, or had any sparks of virtue in them; & she had drawn such an universal hatred upon her self, when we came from Alfenes, that all the Ladies intended to forbear any more visits unto her, as the most dange|rous and detestable person upon earth.

In the mean time, after our departure was resolved upon, and that Gabrias and Protopenes, though they defied one another, yet carrying it as if they were good freinds, all the Ladies came to bid adieu unto Arpasia, and to testifie their sorrows to loose her, yet Argelise must be excepted; who faining to be sick, could not find in her heart to visit a person, who had taken the heart of her Lover from her, and who shee thought, had caused her brother to be in that condition he was, but as for Cleonide, shee came, and had much discourse with Arpasia, in a ver y obliging way.

However, Arpasia telling her, that she beleived, Astidamus would return unto her as soon as he was recovered; Cleonide answered her, that thanks be to the Gods, her recovery had preceded his, for Madam, (said she unto her) if Astidamus had cast me off, only ou- of love to you, than your rare beauty, and excellent merit, might have excused him; and I should have easily pardoned him, but that he should quit me out of self interest, thisisa thing which moves me to scorn him and to rejoyce that I have thrown him out of my heart. And indeed Madam, this fair one desiring to be out of that place where she had received such a most sensible injury, desired her aunt, that she might go back unto her Father, where shortly after, she was very advantageously married.

However, we understood before our departure that Astidamus would not die of his wounds, and we understood further, how it grieved his very soul, that he could not satisfie neither hisambition nor his Love, and therefore conceived a most horrible hatred against his Conquerour, for Protopenes was much incensed against him: Cleonide, she went away, and he saw there was no likelihood of ever marrying Arpasia.

But in conclusion Madam, we parted; and not dreaming of Meliantes, we met him upon the road. Tis true, Gabrias did not see him, and it is as true, that Arpasia had not seen him but for me: For be pleased to know, that as we came to the Town, where he saw her the first time, and informed her concerning the Column which was erected by Sesostris, a man unknown unto me brought me a Letter from Meliantes, which conjured me to help him unto an opportunity of bidding Arpasia adieu, and that since he had been instrumentall, in breaking off her marriage with Astidamus, she would not deny him that favour, upon which consideration, I thought it not fit to deny him what he asked, and knowing Arpasias mind so well as I did, I did not think she would be sorry to see him. Yet I thought it exp|edient not to ask her permission, since perhaps her scrupulous virtue might dorr at it, so as returning an answer unto Meliantes, who was concealed in the town where he lay, I told him, I would use my best endeavours of getting Arpasia to walk in a garden belonging to the house where we lodged, and if he would be at the dore of the garden which was towards the River, I would open it unto him, when Arpasia was there And accordingly it was carried; for it being an easy matter to perswade Arpasia unto a walk when it was fair, because she loved it extreemly, I mo|ved Page 60 it unto her as soon as she did rise from Supper: Arpasia then went whether I desired with very little company, and Meliantes saw her, and spoke to her in an Alley where none but I was with her, and without her contributing unto it: for since it was her custom to talk often in private with me; as soon as she called me all the rest of her women withdrew. I need not tell you, Madam, how she was surprized at the sight of Meliantes; but I will tell you, that as soon as he came neer her, he addressed himself, I beseech you Madam (sayd he unto her) permit me to receive so much satisfaction, as to hear from your owne mouth, the reasons of my condemnation, and to know by what motives, the best and most sweet Lady upon earth is become the most rigorous; for truly Madam, as long as I passed un|der the notion of the strange Meliantes, you esteemed me and was very freindly, but as soon as ever you knew who I was, and knew that I did infinitely love you, then you began to be unjust. To testifie that I am not so (replyed Arpasia) I as|sure you that I do remember all my obligations to you, and will never forget the good service you did me in preventing my marriage with Astidamus; and to ma|nifest my sincerity, more then it may be, I ought, I will ingeniously tell you, that if you had never loved Argelyse, or at least had not promised eternall affection unto her, perhaps I should have permitted you to love me in such a way as you de|sire; since setting your infidelity aside, I do finde you a man every way worthy of my Fathers choice and mine. The truth is, your birth, your wit, your courage, your goodnesse, your generosity, and a thousand other good qualities, are very complaisant; but since you have been so perfidious unto Argelyse who is infinitely amiable, you may as well be so unto Arpasia if she should permit you to love her. Alas Madam (sayd he unto her) I never bore unto Argelyse more than tender friendship: By excusing your selfe one way (replyed she) you accuse your selfe another, for if you were in love with Argelyse, then you were onely an inco|nstant man, and if you were not in love with her, then you were worse then in|constant, in not telling her as much, but ingaging her heart without ingaging yours also: if Phormion told you at Alfenes, what I desired him (replyed Meliantes) he told you that indeed I thought my selfe in love with her, but yet it was onely amity, and therefore ought not to passe for a perfidious man in your opi|nion, though I may passe for an unconstant man in Argelises. However it be, replyed Arpasia, I must never rank you in any other forme, than in the degree of friendship; and therefore I pray you regulate your minde accordingly and be|lieve that it is so impossible I should ever be sure of your affection, as you would be a very unhappy man if I should suffer you to love me: For Argelyse is faire and charming, and since she was not able to returne your heart, it is unlikely I should; and to tell you truly, as the state of things are, I ought to dispose of my selfe; for since my Father did once intend to sacrifice me unto his Revenge, he may perhaps do the like againe, and in all probability I am destined to make the most advanta|geous treaty for him; and I consider my selfe as an Hostage, not knowing into whose power I shall fall.

If I would oblige you unto many things Madam (replyed Meliantes) then you had reason to use these arguments against me, but alas I do not Madam; all I desire is, that you would let me love you, and that you would be pleased to refer the knowldg of my fidelity to time, which is the best Judge of faithfull affections: and I begg this of you before the beginning of a most rigorous absence, and my love will be put upon a most dangerous test, so as if I prove an inconstant man, I shall never trouble you againe, since I shall never see you any more; and if I prove faithfull, I should be unjust if I did not desire the honour of serving you againe. Therefore I beseech you Madam, grant me the liberty to love you, and consider how small a thing it is I aske, for though you should not grant it, yet I could not choose but still adore you, and though you should forbid me, yet I must disobey: But though I should love you whether you will or no, yet I should ima|gine it a great happinesse if I could obtaine your leave for it; therefore deny it not I conjure you Madam, since I begg it without condition. I freely consent (said she unto him) that you should still continue my Freind, but as for matter of Love, never looke for any leave from me: If you do drive me into despaire Madam (said he unto her) you will force me to follow you and never leave you, untill I have Page 61 obtained what I now beg, I think you more generous Meliantes (replyed Arpasia) than to expose my honour. And since the venomous tongued Alcianipe hath given it out, that I obliged you to fight with Astidamus, it would be beleived, if you should take that course, and therefore I conjure you not to thinke of it, nor desire any thing which doth cross my inclination. Let us part therefore since reason requires it, and submit to your destiny, without desiring to be the arbitrator of your own fortune.

If the Gods be resolved you should love me, and that I should change my mind, they will do it by ways unknown unto us, and if they will not, you will trouble your self in vain.

Do therefore I pray you what prudence requires you should, and without any complaints against my rigour, be assured that you have more of my esteem and confidence than ever any person had; alas Madam (said Meliantes then) how little do I want of being happy? for you need but add four or five words more unto what you have said, to make me most compleatly happy.

After this, he used many tender expressions, which indeed did tender the heart of Arpasia, but did not make her resolutions stagger, so as she parted from him, without giving him leave, either to love or follow her, and his fears of incensing her, made him resolve upon a patient departure the next morning, so he returned home with a violent passion, and without hope, and Arpasia returned unto her fa|ther, having a very great esteem of Meliantes.

In the mean time, those who are tyed unto others by such interests as are muta|ble and various, are never well united, longer than the reason which united doth continue, and therefore Protopenes thinking it better to sit still, than ingage him|self in a doubtfull war, he broke off with Gabrias, so that he alone gave just suspit|ions of revolt from the King of Assyria, and prudence requiring, that he should do what his desire of revenge had inspired him withall, he fortified his pall'ce, and made it a garrison, and prepared himself to take part with Cyrus, (as soon as that Prince, who then went under the name of Artamenes) should approach.

In the mean time, we understood Astidamus was still very ill of his wounds, and kept his bed a long time; also we heard that Meliantes was not yet cured of his passion, for he writ very often unto Arpasia, though she did never answer any of his Letters: This true, she suffered me sometimes to write unto him, but ever com|manded me to forbid him writing any more unto her, unless he could better regul|late his mind: And at sometimes me thought, that I had some reasons to think, that if Meliantes were but with Arpasia, and were obsequious in courting her, she would forget his infidelity unto Argelise, but so many severall occasions obliged Melian|tes to stay in his own country, that he could not possibly leave it: for besides his fathers unwillingness to part with him, he was engaged in a business which would not allow him with honour to depart from the place, where his enemies would draw an advantage from his absence.

In the mean time, All Asia being up in arms, either for the illustrious Artame|nes, or for the King of Assiria, nothing else was talked of, and the name of Ar|tamenes was so famous, that it was continually in the mouths both of his friends, and enemies, with equall admiration. Gabrias, being resolved to take his part, he heard to his great greif, that his army was not so strong as the King of Assiria's, but he heard also to his great joy', of the happy Omen which he had, when in belgining to march, he saw a great Eagle flying upon his right hand, which making towards Babylon, seemed to teach him the way he was to take; and he heard fur|ther, to his great satisfaction, that he had repulsed the first troops of his enemies, and forced his passage over the River Gnides. But Madam, a few dayes after, we heard with wonder, of the invention which the famous Artamenes had to make his army pass the river, dividing it into threescore severall channells, also we heard further to our hearts joy, how he had disordered the Assiryan troops, after he had passed the river, and how great a terrour he had struck into the body of the army, so as Gabrias now seeing nothing but a River between him and Artamenes, from whom he looked for protection, he prepared to go and ask it himselfe in per|son. He went then in the head of three hundred horse only to meet this Hero, to offer him all that was in his power, I need not tell you Madam, how the renou|ned Page 62 Artamenes received Gabrias, for you need not doubt of the goodness of that Prince, nor with what magnificence Gabrias entertained him at his pallace; and yet there hapned some passages so pertinent, unto the History of Arpasia, that I must not omit them, I shall therefore tell you Madam, that the first day Artamenes saw the fair Arpasia, an i|lustrious Persian called Hydaspes, was then with him; so as after the first civilities, Artamenes being obliged to talke with Gabrias, who had mentioned unto him somthing concerning a negotiation which he had with the Prince Gadates, to engage him in the interest of Cyaxeres, It was Hydaspes only who talked most unto the fair Arpasia but her wonder was to hear him speak in her own Language very exactly.

I being an eye witness of all passages at this interview, must needs confess, that I thought Hydaspes to be infinitely lovely, yet he was not very tall, being neither too high nor too low, he was very handsome. Moreover, all the features of his face were excellent, and his air infinitely noble; though he was highly brave, yet there was no ferosity in his humour, or behaviour, but on the contrary, he had a marvellous charming sweetness in his physiognomy, his wit was nimble and smooth, and indeed fortune could not bring a more dangerous Rival unto Meliantes than he.

Not that I intend to commend the merits of the one above the other, for I must ingeniously confess, I am unworthy to be a Judge between two such superlative men; but I am confidently perswaded, that none but Hydaspes could ever becom a competitor with him, in the heart of Arpasia, so it chanced, that their first dis|course was somthing dis|advantageous unto Meliantes, because it was advantageous unto Hydaspes, for the conference between Artamenes and Gabrias being very long, the discourse between Hydaspes and Arpasia was not short, but they had time e|nough to talk of many severall things: So that after Hydaspes had elegantly com|mented the beauty of Arpasia, and that she had rejected his applaude, with much ingenuity and modesty; they began to talk of the alteration and revolution which war brings upon all things when it continues long, for it often happens (said Hy|daspes) that war makes strange subversions in the dominions of Love, since it se|parates many Lovers from the persons loved, and many do either cure themselves of their passions, or change their mistresses by changing places, but as for the last of these, it never befalls any Persians; perfidiousness in Love, is a crime which they can never be upbraided with in any Justice. Since it is naturall for every one, to be Lover of their own countries (replied Arpasia) I do not wonder, to hear you commend your own; but I beleive Sir, that there are Infidells of that nature in all countries of the world.

Truly Madam (said he unto her) I know none in Persepolis, and the whole court of Cambys's cannot produce an example to convince me of a Lye, doubtlesse there are some who cease loving sometimes, out of reason, either because their mi|stresses are too rigid, or for some other good cause, but never was any found who changed their affection out of any naturall inconstancy, or because they found o|ther Ladyes more fair than those, they first loved; and they are so fully perswaded, that changing without a good cause is p|erfidiousness, that they make it a point of honour not to change affection out of fantasticalness, but to resist their own inclinations, if they offer to change affection without very good cause,

As Hydaspes said so, the remembrance of Meliantes made Arpasia blush, at least she told me so since, so as to hide this little disorder, the cause whereof she knew very well, she begun to speak, and told Hydaspes (who she saw observed her) that to keep her sel|f in his good opinion she would tell him the cause of that alteration in her face, for truly said she unto him,) I cannot hear you blame infidelity, but I must needs be sorry for a freind whom I do accuse also.

For my Particular, (said Hydaspes) were I a woman, I should never love a man who had taken his affection from another, for who soever will be perfidious to one will also be perfidious to two, and consequently to all the world. I ever had that opinion Sir, replied Arpasia, but to go rationally to work, I conceive it best neither to trust those who are perfidious, nor those who are not, since though they be not yet they may be.

Indeed Madam said Hydaspes you must alwaies except Persians, and of all Persians, Page 63 you must put Hydaspes in the first Rank of those who are incapable of any change in their affections. Truth is, Madam, I do so resolutely love what I do love, that I know not how to retreat: what I think once fair I shall think it so as long as I live, and I am so extreemly jealous of my own thoughts, that I can never change: And I dare assure you that as I have this day begun to esteem you, so I shall esteem you till death; for I cannot think I shall ever discover any thing in your Soul which is not as fair as your face, nor do I doubt but that you have as much generosity as wit.

After this, they talked of many other things which I remember not, but I remem|ber very well that Arpasia talked of nothing but Hydaspes all the rest of the day; and I understood since that Hydaspes talked of nothing but Arpasia after he left her. The day following he saw her again and applauded her more than the day before, and to perfect their acquaintance, Gabrias intending to put his Pallace into the hands of Artamenes purposely to purchase his confidence; Artamenes left Hy|daspes in it, untill Gabrias had finished his treaty with Gadates, and then both to come unto Cyrus before he gave any Battel.

Hydaspes was not a little joyed to remain in a place where Arpasia would be un|der his power; for the t|ruth is, Madam, there was such a powerfull sympathy bet|ween these two persons, as I may very well say that never was grea|ter progress of affection made in so short a time. In the Interim, Gabrias left a Sister in Law of his with his Daughter during his absence, for he followed Cyrus, and never left him since: What inclination soever Arpasia had unto Hydaspes, yet she was troubled to see him Master of the house where she was: but he did use his power with so much sweetness and discretion that she had all the reason in the world to commend him for the respect he used to her; And indeed as it is impossible for a Lover to be without respect, so his awe of her is not to be wondred at, since he fell in love with her at the very first sight; y|et he durst not give her any testimonies of it, least she should imagine that his boldness was an effect of that authority which he had up|on him. Thus he sighed and durst not tell her, untill some happy Accident would give him an opportunity of manifesting his love. Not but that he saw her at all hours when handsomness would permit; for since he had very little to do in that place, and since he took extream delight in seeing her, he was almost inseparable from her, but for all that his fears seal|d up his mouth. Yet to acquaint you how he came to discover his passion: be pleased to know that Hydaspes being very careful of keeping the place which was of a very great consequence, the Guards were very exact, so as a man who was used to bring Letters from Meliantes coming to the Gates he was stay|ed, and since he did not give a very good account of his business, he was searched, and they found about him a Packet without subscription, which Hydaspes opened as soon as it was brought unto him. But in lieu of finding any designs against the place, he saw it concerned the possession of some fair ones heart, and so far from Marti|all ma|sters that the Letter treat|d all of love, and a Love un|satisfied and worse recompenced, since the stile of these Letters were full of respect, Hydaspes imagined that they were intended unto Arpasia; So as the growing pas|sion of his Soul being full of curiosity, he would see him who brought this Packet, unto whom he put many Questions, purposely to make him confess from whom he brought those Letters (for there was one unto him) and unto whom he was to deliver them. But, Madam, Hydaspes was so over joyed to know by this Letter that Meliantes was treated ill, and that he had hopes Arpasia was not in love with any as he grew more in love with her than before, yet he knew not what to do with this Letter: for he conceived that Arpasia would hereafter know how it fell into his hands; so as he told him who had confessed from whom it came and to whom they were addressed, that he should take speciall care of not betraying the secrets of his Master: After which he went to see Arpasia having these Letters in his Pocket.

After she had talked with him of severall things, she asked him whether he heard any news from C|iaxares or from Artamenes? No, Madam (sayd he unto her) but I have this day received a Packet which is not directed unto me, which I will im|part unto you, in saying so, he took the two Letters from Meliantes out of his Pocket, and telling her how the Guards at the Gate had stopped him who brought them, he told her afterwards that since the man would not tell unto whom he was Page 64 to carry them, he would first before he restored them unto him know whether she was that fair severe One unto whom they were intended: for certainly, Madam, sayd he and gave them unto her, that it must be unto some person of Quality: Arpasia was exceedingly perplexed at this, because as soon as ever she saw the Let|ters she knew they were from Meliantes to her: so as to get out of this perplexity, she told Hydaspes, that she was so scrupulous in point of Letters, as she would not see wh|ther they were to her or no, nor did she think it honesty to see too far into the secrets of others; yet Arpasia spoke this after such a manner, as let Hydaspes know that she knew them to be the hand of Meliantes: but he was so joyed that she should think her self so little concerned in those letters, that he could not choose but let his joyes appear in his eyes: yet notwithstanding since Arpasia did not think he knew she had any interest in them, she would have been very glad that they were out of his hands, for she perswaded him to restore them back to the m|an, or else to tear them in peeces: Since, Madam, you give this advise before you know what they contain, replied Hydaspes, I think that as much as I do respect you, yet I shall not follow it; If reading them will oblige you to burn them (sayd she and took them) I had rather see them, and indeed, Arpasia having really a desire to know what was in them, she took them, and turned towards the light to read them as if she had not well enough seen, purposely to hide her blushes: Yet all would not do, for Hydaspes turned as she did and looked attentively upon her as long as she was reading these two Letters which I can shew you; for by chance having them about me the same day Arpasia was carried away, I kept them ever since: and therefore not to trust unto my memory I will read them unto you, that you may the better know what thoughts Hydaspes and Arpasia had, that unto me was thus di|rected.

Unto the most cruell Confident of my PASSION.

Madam,

I Wonder not so much at the cruelty of that most admired Person whom I adore as at yours, nor do I wonder so much that she should never answer me, as that you should write unto me, to assure me that she will never write; for since I cannot leave loving her, I would delude my self and live less miserable, and not run into mad despair as you would make me: I am resolved to come ere long and see whether your words will be bet|ter than your Letters.

In the Interim, be so good as to shew this unto her who rains in my heart, and tell her that it is so absolutely impossible for me to be only her friend, as I shall disobey her as long as I live, if she continue obstinate in so unjust a command.

As long as this Letter was in reading, Hydaspes all the while looked upon Arlpasia, who seeing there was nothing in it which would admit of an ill construction, did so well recover her disorder, that she began to read this which I shall read unto you, without any agitation of spirits, though it was intended unto her in these words.

Unto the most fair but most inhumane Person in the World.

Madam,

YOu are so very unjust, that no Patience can indure it without complaint, for you are pleased not only not to answer me, and to cause another to write, that you will not write any more unto me; but you command me by her that my love should turn it self into friendship, and if I do not, that then your friendship would turn it self into hatred: I cannot tell, Madam, whether your Soul be capable of such a Prodigious change or no; But I am sure my love cannot become friendship and no more: Beleive it, Madam, I beseech you, that all your transcendent Merits are not able to work this change in me; But on the contrary know, that be as rigorous as you can unto me, yet I cannot choose but still love you.

After Arpasia had read this Letter, she told Hydaspes that since it appeared it was intended unto some virtuous Person, it was pity it should be made publike, & therf[or]e to prevent it, she would be keeper of it, for (sayd she and smiled) since she unto whom it is intended does not answer him who writ it, I have changed my opinion, & do not think it fit to be restored unto the man who brought it, least since it hath been opened he should abuse it: Also it is fitter to remain in my hands than yours, Sir, for since she unto whom it was meant, is very virtuous & reserved, I will spare her the sorrows of any ever knowing that any is in love with her. I do imagine, Madam, replied Hydaspes, that you do know who this fair and virtuous Person is, and if it be as I do imagine (added he and looked her in the face) I am contented to leave these two Letters with you, upon condition you will promise me that she shall never return any answer to them, or at least not answer them favourably. I profess Hydaspes (sayd Arpasia and laughed) I do wonder you should speak thus, for you know not who writ those Letters, nor unto whom they were written, and yet you would interest me in this innocent business. Indeed, Madam, replied he, I do interest my self more in this business than ever I did in any other, and therefore I conjure you to honour me so far as to promise me that she unto whom this un[k]nown lover hath written will not make any answer: All I can do, replied she, is to promise you that if I do come to know her, she shall not answer with my cons[en]t: I ask no more, Madam, replied he, for so she will never answer. But, Madam (pursued he and would not give her time to reply) I beseech you ask her, whether all who shall pretend to love her must expect to be as unhappy as this Lover, and whether she will not answer unto words spoken no more then she will Letters? There is so little reason in your demands, Sir, replied she, that I know not what to answer, for you cannot tell whether ever I shall know her unto whom this Letter is intended, nor do I know her my self, and yet you would have me discover the se[cr]ets of her heart, and tell her your thoughts, and that I almost think you are in love with her. As for the last of these, Madam, replied he, I beseech you never doubt it, but be confidently perswaded that I am more in love with her unto whom this Letter was written, than he who writ it can be. As Arpasia was ready to reply, her Aunt entred; so that the conference being broken, the Letters remained with Arpasia who gave them unto me before Hydaspes, to testifie unto him that she did not value them, for she knew by his last own words that he either knew or strongly suspected that it was she who had the greatest interest in them: But, Madam, to avo[oi]d being tedious after so long a relation, Hydaspes carried himself so well and re[spectively] unto Arpasia, and he so fully perswaded her that he had never been unfaithfull nor ever could be, that he was more happy than ever Meliantes was since the fair Arpasia permitted him to love her. Thus this fair Person dividing the ten[d]erness of her heart, she kept all her friendship for Meliantes, and all her love for Hydaspes, who was more obsequious unto her than ever any other Lover was. But Madam, one strange Accident chanced: for be pleased to know that Hydaspes halv[ing] Page 66 sent back the man who brought the Letters from Meliantes; this Lover was so grieved at the adventure, that hasting his Journey he came disguised unto the Pallace: But since none was permitted to enter without very strick inquisition, and since he had a noble Aire which he could not disguise, he was stayed, and known who he was by some men who waited upon Gabrias at Alfenes, and who believing him to be one of the King of Assyrias side, advertised Hydaspes, who in lieu of being glad to see his Rivall in his power, was very sorry for it, for he found him so handsom and amiable, that be feared his being loved.

In the mean time, Arpasia quickly hearing that Meliantes was stayed by Hydaspes, she beleived that her Obligations to him for breaking off her Marriage with Astidamus, and her reall esteem of him, did require that she would intreat Hydaspes to use him well, but to do it and not make him jealous, she desired him to set him at liberty and send him away with a Convoy, least he should fall into the hands of Artamenes, who might perhaps take him for an Enemy, though he had not yet declared himself. On the other side, Meliantes who had wit at will, did know very well by the proceedings of Hydaspes, that he was in love with Arpasia; for when he was stayed, as having some design upon the place, Meliantes desired he might be carried before Arpasia, that she might answer for his innocency, assuring himself that as soon as she saw him, she would cleer him of any such design: Hydaspes an[s]wering him somewhat nicely he gave Meliantes some cause of suspition that Hydaspes loved her, and that he knew of his love also, so as he thought himself in worse condition than before, and the worse when he knew all the certainty of it by a man of his acquaintance who belonged unto Arpasia; But he thought himself worst of all when Hydaspes told him, that at the request of Arpasia he might go whether he plea[re]d, and that he would let him have a Convoy to Guard him; but he would by no means depart untill he had seen Arpasia, and was so resolutely obstinate: The Arpasia hearing of it, and fearing he should make too great a blun[d]er in the business, she intreated Hydaspes to let him see her. Untill now Hydaspes was so respective unto her, as he seemed to be ignorant of Meliantes his love; but when she de[m]on[st]rated to see him he could not choose but hinder him, yet he did it with so much respect, as he was so far from offending her, as he obliged her to confess all her Adventure with Meliantes, and not to disguise her esteem and amity to him. But, Madam (sayd Hydaspes) what security can I have against such an accom[plis]ht Rivall as he is, if you should grant him the honour to see you? you, I say, who have done nothing for me but what friendship may require you should do for him. I pray Hydaspes (sayd she and blusht) oblige me not to tell you what difference I make between Meliantes and you; content your self with this that I desire of you a Favour which h[er] can never enjoy without loosing me, since if you give him that liberty which I ask for him he must go far enough from me.

In conclusion, Hydaspes commanded that Meliantes should be brought unto Arpasias Chamber, before he was conducted out of the Town: But since she did not think that Meliantes had any suspicion that Hydaspes was in love with her, she was not afraid to see him: but on the contrary, did desire it in hopes to perswade him to think no more upon her. But after the first salute she told him he was beholding unto Hydaspes for setting him at liberty and not acquainting Artamenes: Alas, Madam, sayd he unto her, though I do not acknowledge the liberty which he gives me for a Favour, yet I shall not be ungratefull: But I think that I have more reason of complaint against his banishing of me, than to thank him for my liberty: For, Madam, I see Hydaspes loves you, & if I be not much mistaken, Hydaspes is much more fortunate and happy in your favour than ever Meliantes was. All that I can say unto you, is (replied Arpasia) that I will do justice unto you both, and what place soever you had in my heart, you shall hold it as long as I live; nor is it so bad a one as you imagine, for I hold you in the degree of esteem, Acknowledgment and Friendship: how glorious soever that honour be, Madam (replied he) yet would I most willingly exchange with Hydaspes; however I am most sure he can[no]t love you with a Zeal comparable to me: However it be Meliantes, sayd Arlpasia, since <◇> look upon you only as my friend, it will not concern you whether Hydaspes be my Lover or no, but if you value my friendship, it concerns you to speak nothing which may offend me; and therefore I conjure you for your own Page 67 sake to confirm your mind unto mine and to be perswaded of two things; the first is, that your friendship may preserve mine as long as I live: The second is that your love may procure you my hatred; for Meliantes do not deceive your, self, and know that I did never deceive you, but as soon as ever I knew of your fidelity to Argelise, I alwayes told you, that neither I would nor could trust your affection. But I beseech you, Madam (replied Meliantes) who ever told you that Hydaspes who is a person hath not committed as great a peece of Infidelity as this wherwith you upbraid me? yet Meliantes may talk and complain as long as he will before he can change the heart of Arpasia: she tells him indeed that she doth infinitely esteem him, but she tells him withall that his love must never find recompence nor be indured, and he must part from her without so much leave as to love her without any hopes, although she doth promise friendship as long as she lives. Hydaspes being extreemly desirous to know how his discourse with Arpasia had thriven, he would be satisfied by seeing him, and guess by his eyes whether he had been well or ill received; and indeed it was apparant by the sadness of Meliantes, that Hydaspes had good cause to rejoyce. The interview of these two Rivalls was very hollow hearted, and never Prisoner received his liberty with fewer signs of acknowledgment. Thus, Madam, the amiable and unhappy Meliantes went much against his will from a place where he left his Mistress in the power of his Rivall; Tis true, she was not long there for presently after we heard that Gabrias had finished the Treaty of Gadates with Artamenes; that the King of Hircania and the Prince of the Cadusians having received some discontents from the King of Assyria, took part with Ciaxares. That the King of Cyprus had sent Forces unto Artamenes un[d]er the command of the two famous Grecians, the one named Themocrates, the o[th]er Philocles, and that within a few daies after a Battel would be fought which in probability would be decisive: So as Hydaspes being perswaded that Artamenes would send for him, he began to prepare himself for a sudden departure, as soon as ever he should receive orders for it, and he knew that love and honour do not alwaies require the same things; for he had a good mind to go whether his honour called him, and he had a good mind also to stay where his affection invited him.

In the mean time, Artamenes having now a full confidence in Gabrias who had linked Gadates unto his Interests, would needs out of his generosity give back the absolute Authority of his Palace unto him; So as we were much surprised one morning when we heard that Hydaspes had received commands to go unto the Ar[m]y: That the Forces which Artamenes had left in the Town, had orders also to go out, and that Gabrias sent a Cousin of his to command there in his Palace. I shall not insist upon any relations unto you Madam, what Hydaspes and Arpasia thought upon this occasion, for you will easily conceive them since I have already told you that Hydaspes was infinitely in love with Arpasia, and Arpasia had a strong inclin[ati]on towards Hydaspes, yet she would not ingage her self further than to permit her Lover to love her, and to send her news during his absence.

But Madam, presently after, fame spoke loud in the glory of Artamenes, and very advantageously of Hydaspes, for we heard, that the first of these gained the bat[t]le against the King of Assyria, and the second, having orders to fall upon the King of Phrygia, had overcome him, and took him prisoner, and which added to his glo[r]y, in writing to Arpasia, he mentioned not a word of himself, nor any thing but of Artamenes only; in whose applause he told such wonders as was hardly credible the valour of a man could reach so high, as he did set him out.

Af[te]r this Madam, such was still the affection of Hydaspes unto Arpasia, that in what place soever either he or she was, she was never above ten dayes without a Letter from him. During the siege of Babylon, she received one constantly every four days; and whilst he was at Synope, shee received one oftner than ordinary, because he had matter enough to send her.

Indeed Madam, during all the Armenian and the Lydian war, there was a constant commerce of intelligence with out any interruption, until the renowned Art[ame]nes left that name for that of Cyrus, and sent Hydaspes from the Camp at Cumes to release the King of Assyria.

But Madam, I forgot to tell you, that when Cyrus went into Armenia from Synope, there was a most pestilent infection in the place where we were, so as the Page 68 Aunt of Arpasia, with whom we then were, was constrained to go out into ano[th]er strong Castle belonging unto Gabrias, purposely to avoid the contagious air, and in that place she continued untill that accident hapned, which caused her to be at present under the power of Thomyris. And to acquaint you with this misfortune in few words, be pleased to know, that this Aunt unto Arpasia had a son by a former husband, who had been a long time from her, and returned just when we came to that Castle: He was no sooner arrived, but he fell in Love with Arlpasia, but durst not at first acquaint her; not but that this man whose name was Astidamus, was audacious enough naturally, but Arpasia being then very solitary. she would not give him any occasions of talking in private with her; for I being she, who knew all the secrets of her soul, she was never better pleased, than when she could freely talk with me without any witnesses, and indeed, we had alwayes a hundred things to talk of, though we had nothing to do. That which most did a[m]aze us, was, that we never heard any thing of Meliantes, and to increase our wonder, we heard afterwards, that he was not in his own country, nor knew any where he was. As for Astidamus the Nephew of Protogenes, we had better information concerning him, for we heard, that after he was recovered, he sought for Meliantes to fight with him, and not meeting with him, he returned unto Alfenes, where he carried himself so, that he so much offended Protogenes, as that he would not acknowledge him for his successor, but banish'd him his presence, so as leaving Alfenes, he went to travell, so as when the other Astidamus fell in love with Arpasia, we knew not were Meliantes, nor his ancient Rivall was.

In the mean time, since the passion of this fresh Lover augmented, so that it was impossible for him; but if ever he saw Arpasia alone, to discover his passion unto her, but he did discover it in such an arrogant manner, that Arpasia was extreemly angry with him, and answered him with such authority, forbidding him to make the least mention of any such thing, as he saw there was little hopes of elver being loved, yet the slenderness of his hopes did not quench the flames of his passion, but on the contrary, they blazed out more violently, so as despair made him take up a resolution, as unjust as violent.

For Madam, his design was to suborn the guards of the Castle, and seize upon it, afterwards to force Arpasia to marry him: But Madam, whilst he was plotting this design, the other Astidamus plotted another also, for being out of favour both with Protogenes and also his Mother, he knew not what course to take since he had heard somthing how Hydaspes was in Love with Arpasia, he could not find a heart to take that side he was on, nor could he attempt any thing for the King of Assyria, who was out of all hopes to get upon his Throne again. So that in this perplexity of mind, knowing Arpasia was in this Castle, his design was to surprize it; and make himself master of it, and to be revenged upon Meliantes wheresoe'ever he was, by possessing Arpasia, of whom he had such a miscellany of thoughts, as I think no man living is able to describe them.

But Madam, to let you know more than our selves did at that time, give me leave to tell you that Meliantes, who was not heard of in any place, had also a very odd design.

As I remember Madam, I told you that Hydaspes had given him a convoy to conduct him whither he pleased, when at the request of Arpasia, he was released. But as fate cannot be avoided, so it hapned, that Meliantes wandering from one place to another, he was met by some forces belonging unto Artamenes, who was not then known to be Cyrus, so as by this means he was made a prisoner, and as chance would have it, this accident hapned just as Hydaspes had orders to go unto Artaimenes, and upon his way, did meet those who took Meliantes. whom he knew as he passed by, so that he being a Rivall unto whom he stood in fear of, he was very glad to see him in such a condition, as that he could not make any use of his absence, nor go disguised unto Arpasia: Also it chanced, that the Officer who commanded that party which took Meliantes, was his very particular, and singular good friend, so as coming to him, he asked him, what he intended to do with his Prisoner? & the other answering, that all prisoners belonging to those who took them, he should go into a little castle under his command, and stay there untill Artamenes did know the quality of the prisoner: As soon as he had said so, a Resentment Page 69 of Love and jealousy, moved Hydaspes to tell his freind, that this Prisoner was his Rivall; and least he should take any advantage of his absence, he was glad he was a prisoner: and would be glad he did continue so untill the war were ended, obliging him notwithstanding to treat him very well, during all the time of his captivity which seemed would be long.

Meliantes was accordingly conducted unto this little Castle and left there un|der the keeping of him who commanded there in chief; but Madam, to return un|to the last Lover of Arpasia, and unto the Nephew of Protogenes, give me leave to tell you, that the design which Astidamus of Alfenes had of surprizing the Castle, and the design of the other Astidamus also, was to make a mutiny in the Garrison, against him who commanded it, to the end they might become Masters of Arpasia, and they were so strangely conducted by the destinies, that the execution of both their designe was to be in one and the same night, and also in one and the same houre: So as Madam; never was disorder like unto this, in which we were, for whilst the souldiers which this new Lover had gained, went unto the chamber of him who commanded in chief, with intentions either to turn him out of the place, or to kill him, if he resisted. Astidamus of Alfenes in the head of three hundred men, which the Governour of a neighbour Garrison (who was his freind, and called Lycander) had given him, he came and set Ladders against the walls of the Castle.

You may easily imagin, how the Commander in chief was surprized, to see him|self assaulted by his own souldiers; Also you may imagin, how the other Astidamus was astonished, to see that the Castle should be stormed by men whom he knew not, however, be they who they would, he must think upon defending himself: but since he would not have enemies both without and within also, he caused him who commanded the Castle for Gabrias, to be stabbed, and also all the souldiers who were of his intelligence to be killed.

But since the execution of this cruell Command required some time, it gave so much time unto Astidamus of Alfenes, as to get many of his men into the Castle, then there began such a horrid combat, as the very memory of it makes me quake, we no sooner heard this hideous noise, but we got up in all haste and not being able to do any thing else, we fell unto our prayers.

But Madam, whilst Astidamus of Alfenes did his best to make himself Master of the place, and whilst the other Astidamus did resolutely defend it, they heard a noise of armed men approaching, so as both sides taking the allarum, both Astidamus of Alfenes and the other Astidamus, thought how only to get away Arpasia, so as both of them understanding where her chamber was, they both went unto its but by two severall stayres.

Imagin I beseech you, in what a pittifull case we were in, for on the one side, we heard a voice of the second Astidamus, who we heard had killed the Commander of the Castle, and all his Souldiers, and on the other side, we heard a voice which we knew not, for Astidamus of Alfenes did not speak or if he did, wee knew not his voice. But our greatest amuze was, to hear on both sides the name of Astidamus called upon, so as we would not open the dore unto either of them. But at last Astidamus of Alfenes first breaking open the dore, we saw him enter with a drawn sword in his hand, and immediatly after, three of his men forced Arpasia to go down the great stayres, and I following her very close, we were carryed into the Court, we were forced upon horse back, thus they carried us away, maugre all our complaints and cries, before the other Astidamus could opposeit, for he being in a strait stair case, Astidamus of Alfenes set som of his men to hinder his coming out, untill he himself was got out of the castle.

In the mean time, those armed men which were heard, and who hastned the carrying away of Arpasia, were not such as he supposed them, for he understood by Lycander, whom he met, that the inhabitants of the town, no sooner heard that the garrison was weakned; but they took up arms, and forced him to go out of their town, with the remnant of souldiers which he had.

Thus Madam, it was he who came to Astidamus of Alfenes, who understanding how he had caused a misfortune unto his freind, and by this means had no place of retreat neer, he thought himself in a sad condition.

Page 70 But Lycander and Astidamus were in a worse state, when at break of day they perceived that their souldiers had left them, and having now also some twenty horses remaining, they forced us to make all imaginable haste, wee not knowing whither they would carry us.

But Madam, the strangest thing was that Astidamus of Alfenes in carrying away Arpasia, out of resentments both of revenge and interest, was more in love with her than ever, and had been culpable of being moved by adulatory language, had she pardoned this unjust Lover.

On the other side, Lycander his friend who had never seen Arpasia before, was so taken with her beauty, that it was impossible for him to look upon her without wonder.

Mean time, we marched on still, not knowing whither they carryed us, but at last we came to a wood where we saw the other Astidamus appear in the head of ten or twelve horse, who came to assault that Astidamus who carried us away. As for Lycander, he was parted from us, with four or five of his men to find out the way through the wood, through which we were to passe: The combat Madam was fierce and bloody; the two Astidamuses were driven to such a necessity of thinking upon themselves, as I do not think they thought upon Arpasia.

She and I alighted whilst those who looked unto us, went to defend the lives of their masters, and the other Astidamus was so busie in fighting with his enemy, that he took no notice of us. So that taking this opportunity, we ran into the thicke of the wood, whilst they were fighting. In the mean time, as we understood since the second Astidamus was killed by the other, and Lycander turning back at the noise which he heard was accused by his freind for carrying away Arpasia whilst he was fighting; for the affection of Lycander unto that fair one was so visible, that he perceived it: Yet this accusation was false, for there was no appearance of it, since Lycander returned home with his men; but for all that, they quarrelled and fought, and Lycander killed him with his own hand. After this victory, he sought us all the day and all the night, and all in vain, for we had hid ourselves in a cave, which at this time served us for a Sanctuary, but the fear of wild beasts and famin together forcing us out the next morning, we were so happy as to meet Hydaspes, who after he had delivered the King of Assyria, whom he accompanied unto Cy|rus at Cumes, he lost his way in the wood where we met with him.

Niside making here a stop, related more particularly what Hydaspes had done for Cyrus, and the joyes which Arpasia expressed to meet with him, telling afterwards how an empty coach came accidentally by, in which Hydaspes put her: How they had seen men lye dead in the wood amongst which Arpasia knew her ravisher to be one likewise, she related the arrivall of Lycander, the contest between Hydaspes and him, their combat; and all that Hydaspes did untill he fell dead close by the Coach of Arpasia. Afterwards she told the Princesses, how Lycander having formerly an acquaintance with Atergatis in Assyria, intended to carry Arpasia into that Court as his retreat, but afterwards when hee saw that shee was troubled at it, he altered his design, and imbarqued upon the Euxine sea, and how by tem|pest they were driven unto Chalcidias, where Arpasia fell sick of sorrow.

The truth is Madam, (pursued Niside) she was so extreemly grieved at the cross|ness of her fortune, and at her feares of Hydaspes his death, that her health was much impaired; She did nothing but talk unto me of all her misfortunes among which she reckoned this for one, that she knew not what was become of the un|fortunate Meliantes. But when she was a little recovered, we understood, that Lycander hearing of Cyrus his approach, resolved to take part with Thomyris, and obtained her Protection. But to our wonder, I thought one morning at the first opening of our Tents, that I saw the miserable Meliantes disguised in the habit of a Messagettan; so that Madam, since Arpasia hath three Lovers living, and all brave men, I cannot think her at the end of her miseries, nor that you can add any comforts unto her, but to pity her and to let Gabrias know the miserable condition in which she is, and to interest your self in her misfortunes.

Niside having ended her Relation, the Princesses expressed much satisfaction from her, and thought it convenient, that as soon as they saw, Intaphernes and A|tergatis to make known by them unto Gabrias and Hydaspes the true state of Arp|sias Page 71 Arp|sias fortunes. But whilst they were preparing for their great interview which was to add consolation unto them, they knew not, that the heart of Thomyris en|tained such thoughts as were like to prevent them. The truth is, this Queen who her self desired this truce, and who wished for a sight of Cyrus being upon the point of meeting, her heart began to tremble, so that she could not master it, and as all passionate persons are more apt to change their opinions than others, because they are wholly guided by the motions of those passions which possess them; so Thomyris now feared, what before shee desired, and began to be quite of another mind. For (sayd she) what is it I would say unto Cyrus? and what can I hope he will say unto me? shall I speak unto him concerning hatred or concerning love? shall I appear unto him as a Lover or as an Enemy? is it possible I should ever think he can change his thoughts of me, since I cannot change my thoughts of him? Am I now more amiable than I was, when he stole out of my Court? No, no, but on the contrary, I am so unlike what I was, that I can hardly know my self: when I look in my Glass I find mine eyes are not so much changed as I imagined, but yet my Glory is stained, and I am so dishonoured, that it is impossible Cyrus should now esteeme me, though I am not culpable of any other fault but too much loving him: And therefore since there is no manner of likelihood that I should change his heart, by such an interview as this, I will not see him, or at least untill after Arianthes hath seen him: For if he speak still with much affection of Manodna, I must not see him at all; for if I do see him. I cannot afterwards treat him as the murderer of my Son: I know very well that I can say I have learned some things which I knew not off before; but I know again, that I shall expose my self by seeing him unto the most cruell adventure that can possibly befall any one that is in Love, which is, to find hatred and scorn in the eyes of the person loved. Stay therefore I will, untill Cyrus hath seen his Rivall, and I will not expose my self to be scorned by a Prince whose glory is so firmly grounded, that all the world will think whomsoever he scorns is worthy to be so.

After this, Thomyris being settled in her resolution, gave all requisite orders for the interview of Cyrus and Ariantes, for that of Intaphernes, Atergatis, Istrina, and the Princess of Bythinia. Cynus on his side, prepared to see his Rivall, and enIdeavoured to perswade him, not to be her Pe-se-cutor after he had been her Deli-verer.

But to loose no time in the interim of this Truce, in case that all perswasions proIved fruitless, that Ingeneer with whom Cyrus had agreed, was so diligent in his busiIness, that he had prepared so many Trees as were requisite to burn all the wood between the two narrow passages, and he did it so cunningly by the help of those Souldiers which Cyrus appointed to follow his order,, that not one of either-side knew of the business, excepting those who were necessary for the execution of it.

In the mean time, the day and houre for this interview being come; both sides prepared themselves for it, yet these two interviews were performed severall waies, for Intaphernes and Atergatis were conducted by the Officers of Thomyris unto a Tent where those two Princesses whom they were to see should be brought: That of Cyrus and Ariantes was to be on Horse-back between the two Frontier Guards of both Camps, and in a place where the wood being divided into three severall diIvisions, there was a great Plain between for this Interview.

In the mean time, Intaphernes and Atergatis went unto the place which they longed to be at, and they had undertaken so many severall businesses that if they had dispatched them all, they would not have had any time to talk of love unto their Princesses; for Cyrus desined them to talk unto them concerning Mandana: Myrsiles conjured them to enquire of Doralisa; Gabrias obliged them to know all circumstances concerning Arpasia: Hydaspes also conjured them unto the same, by the sensibility of their own Passions: So as since all Lovers do more willingly serve such friends as are in love, than others, they were more ready to do a good Office for Arpasia in consideration of her Lover than in consideration of her FaIther, but they thought principally of those joys which they were going to receive, which were so great, that when they entred into the Tent, where their Princesses were permitted to meet them, they could not express their thoughts by their words. As for the Princesses they were more Mistresses of themselves than the Princes: for Page 74 though the Princess Istrina perhaps had as great a desire to speak unto Atergatis, as unto Intaphernes, yet she went to her Brother before she went unto her Lover.

Atergatis for his part without any consideration of the Princess of Bythinias rank, he saluted Istrina first, and went where his love invited him: The discourse of these four Persons a first was generall, for since they were acquainted with all the secrets of each others hearts, and since their fortunes were so twisted that they could not sever them, they repeated all the misfortunes which hapned since they saw one anIother: They spake of Spitridates and Aramenta of Gadates and Gabrias, of Cyrus and Mandana: Atergatis remembered the request of Myrsyles, and Intaphernes that of Hydaspes, and the Princesses told them all that they thought conducing to the service of Arpasia. But afterwards failing insensibly into particular talk without changing of places, Intaphernes talked in private with the Princess of Bythinia, and Atergatis with Istrina: So as in this hours private discourse they renewed their affections and tyed stronger knots of love than ever.

On the other-side, the hour of the interview between Cyrus and Ariantes being come, these two Rivals with equall numbers of men met in the Plain which I spoke of before in the Wood, and according to the agreement they met on hors-back; yet they might very well talk in private, because all the company kept purposely at convenient distances.

In the mean time, the spirits of these two Rivals were very different: for Ariantes knowing he had betrayed Cyrus, he was much ashamed to look him in the face, and if he durst have disobeyed Thomyris he would not have consented unto this interview; yet love being a Passion which excuseth all things, he conceived that his Crime being caused by excess of love he was not so criminal as he thought himself, and he no sooner saw Cyrus, but looking upon him as a Rivall, and a Rivall loved, his anger did dissipate a great part of his shame. As for Cyrus, he looked upI on Ariantes as that Traitor, and ungratefull Anaxaris, who had robbed him of all his felicity in carryng away Mandana, yet considering how he had her in his power, his excess of Love did cool his resentment, also the last generosity of Ariantes, disposed him to look lesse fiercely upon him. Cyrus at this time, was waited upon by Mazares, Myrsiles, Araspes, Aglatidas, Sylamis, Mnesiphiles, Chyrsias, Chyrsantes, Lygdamis, and many others. And Ariantes was followed by Octomalsades, Agathirsis, Andramites, and all the most considerable men in the Court of Thomyris, except Aripithes, who could not endure the sight of Cyrus, but with a sword in his hand; for being perswaded, that if Thomyris had not loved this Prince then he had been happy, he hated him most extremly. But at last, Cyrus and Ariantes being met, and having saluted each other, only out of complementall generosity, Cyrus began to speak first.

Before I begin to speak unto you, (said he unto him) I would gladly know from your own mouth, whether I should look upon you as the valiant Anaxaris, whom I most dearly loved, or as the Ravisher of Mandana, whom I am obliged to hate: Were it possible (replied he) that I could be the same Anaxaris, I was in Lydia, or when I was prisoner at Cumes, I should wish your friendship; but since, it is imIpossible for me to be any other than the Lover of the Princess Mandana; I beleive that I shall hardly be the freind of Cyrus, not but that I am extremly sorry, forI fortune should force me to be ungratefull; but since Sir you know the power of Mandana's charmes, I have no excuse for my passion, but that it is above my reason. Though I were the most in love of any man living, (replied Cyrus) yet Love should never make me do any thing which I should repent of, nor which should bring reproach upon me. It is so easie a matter to be just, when one is happy (replied Ariante's) and so difficult a business not to be unjust when one is miserable, that it is no wonder at the difference betwixt you and me in this busine-s: since you have no mind, (replied Cyrus) that I should consider you as a man which will hearken unto Reason, Justice, or Generosity; but as a man whom Love must disIpendce with all the duties of rationally society, I must tell you, that looking upon you simply as the Lover of Mandana, I must look upon you as a man who does even the very worst he can do: For (added he without speaking a word of Thomyris his passion) in keeping Mandana in the power of the Messagettan Queen (who most unjustly accuseth me of her sons death) you expose her unto all the Rigours <2 pages missing> Page 73 which revenge is capable of, and you are the most unworthy Lover in the world, if you prefer your own interest before the life of her you love; and therefore to do justly, let not Mandana be in the power of Thomyris, make choice of such a Sanctuary for her as may be inviolable, in any place of the world: And then not to ruin your protectors by an unjust war, let us end our difference by single combat: It was a thing which -ingged my self into with the King of Assyria, though he was a prisoner, and I have more reason to offer it unto a man who is in the head of an arImy. For (said he) out of his high generosity, to shew that Love does not make me so unjust as you are, I do confess, that if my most faithfull passion had not set me above all my Rivalls, or if death had made me quit the right which I have unto the possession of Mandana, then there were none in the world but Mazares who could dispute with you for her. To give you a direct answer unto the proposition which you make (replied Ariantes) I must tell you that I am not in a condition to accept of it, for doubtless, I am strong enough to hinder Thomyris from attemptIing any thing against the life of the Princesse, but not to get her out of her hands.

Moreover, to make it appear that I am unjust only in matters relating to my Love, I do declare, that in consideration of those obligations upon me when I was Anaxaris, I will never fight against you, but in the way of war, unless fortune should bring us together as it did in the wood, neer the Fort of Sauromates, so as all I can say unto you is, that I wil defend the life of Mandana, against the Queen my sister, as if she were my utter enemy, and I will keep the possession of that PrinIcess against you, as if you had never ingaged me by your obligations, provided you will defend her against Thomyris, (replied Cyrus sharply) I care not what resollutions you take against mee, for since the war I make is just, and since the Gods are so likewise, and since my armes use to be fortunate, it may so come to passe that the Messagettan Queen may come to repent of her injuries, and you also repent of what you have done. Fortune replied Ariantes, is sometimes weary with alIwaies favouring the same man; I know not whether fortune be weary (replied Cyrus) but I am sure the Gods are never weary of being just, nor will I ever be weary of persecuting the persecutors of Mandana all the world over: Think thereIfore of what I propose before we part, I offer once more to fight with you, and to lay aside all those advantages which war hath given me, provided Mandana may be safe, yes (added this Illustrious Prince) I will engage my self, to surrender the Fort of Sauromates, to carry my forces beyond Araxes, and never to make more war upon Thomyris, provided you will oblige her to put the Princess Mandana in some place of safety. I have already told you (replied Ariantes) that I am able to defend the life of Mandana against Thomyris, but I cannot get her out of her power, than theres an end of the truce this very hour (replied Cyrus very angrily) nor will I see Thomyris; for since you cannot perswade her, I am sure I cannot: however, be you the Protector of Mandana against Thomyris, and to give you an example of my equity I declare unto you, that if Mandana do prefer you before me and have a mind to make you happy, I do declare, I say, that I will lay down armes, and without any thoughts of revenge either upon Thomyris or upon you, I will only think to cure my self by death, but yet I will hear her declaration of it from her own mouth.

Alas, alas (said Ariantes) you know too well, that Mandana will not pronounce sentence on my side, and therefore I can say no more unto you, than what I have already: Since it is so, (said Cyrus sharply) I must retire and prepare my self to fight with you in the head of my army, since you will not otherwise. When I meet you so, (replied Ariantes,) I shall defend my self as I have done, and perhaps I shall vanquish you, as I have done (said Cyrus and retired) As this Prince proInounced these last words with much haste, so Ariantes did not well understand them, but returning a doubtfull answer which Cyrus understood not neither. They both of them retyred looking fiercely upon one another, and saying no more. Yet a velry notable difference might be seen in the fiercense of these two Princes: for there appeared in Ariantes a mixture of shame and melancholly amongst the fiercelIness of his countenance, but in Cyrus, nothing could be seen but great and Heroick: For though the fire of his anger sparkled in his eyes, yet he had a majesty in his countenance, and such a kind of nobleness and grandure in his carriage, and such a Page 74 sprightly activity in his looks, as his anger appeared to be very terrible, He turIned himself twice or thrice towards his Rivall, after he was parted; but as for Ariantes he had not power to do the like, for he having virtuous inclinations, he had a strange repugnancy in himself, as oft as his love did force to things or thoughts against virtue:

However, as soon as Cyrus saw Mazares and Myrsiles, he told them all the discourse which Ariantes and he had, for since they stood at distances in the wood they had not heard what they said: but he spoke unto them with such a sprightly countenance, as made it apparant to them, that he thought of nothing so much as to be fighting. On the other side, Thomyris who waited impatiently for the reIturn of Ariantes, that she might deliberate after that, whether she would see Cyrus or no, and she no sooner saw the Prince her brother, but she desired an account of this interview. Since Ariantes could not faithfully relate all the conference, least he should move her unto some violent resolutions against Mandana, he would never touch upon that string, but though out of a resentment of love unto his miIstress, he durst not incense Thomyris, against his Rivall; yet that Princess having a peircing apprehension, plainly perceived, that there was no hopes Cyrus would not cease loving Mandana, so that having no disposition to see him, she colIoured it with a pretence, that she had received some Letters which advised her that it was not expedient to expose her self unto that interview, which she resolved upon with Cyrus, so as by this means, that Prince was delivered from this trouble: Yet he had the conIolation to understand by the return of Intaphernes and Atergatis, that Mandana was not ill treated, and excepting the -ollitude in which she lived, since the death of Spargapiees, she suffered under no notion of violence. HowelIver, the truce being ended, Cyrus be thought himself of executing his design; so as giving all requisite orders for it, he was ready the next night to try the rare secret of the Ingeneer, which would burn all the wood between the two strait passages and cut off all communicat-Ion between the enemies quarters. Cyrus then having made choise of such troops as were to assault the enemy at that place which was most weakly guarded, he prepared himself for the execution of this enterprize which was of so great importance.

Yet he did not quit that quarter which he possessed neer the other pass, least the enemy should discover his design.

In the mean time, the project of the Ingeneer did take admirably well: For he judiciously foresaw, that the wind would rise to favour his enterprize, and would rise so, as would blow the flames towards those Enemies which would relieve those which Cyrus assaulted, and not towards the troops of that Prince. Night being come, Cyrus ordered his men fit for an assault; but before he marched, he acquainIted the officers with the fire, which would be on their left hand, and they acquainIted their souldiers, so as the thing passing from mouth to mouth, every one was prepared in a quarter of an hour, not to wonder at an accident so extraordinary, but on the contrary, to beleive that the victory would be certainly theirs, almost without any danger.

This being the state of things, Cyrus in the head of his troops, began to march to|wards the pass: But least the assault should precede the burning, assoon as that Prince began to march, the Ingeneer according to his first design, did set fire unto twelve trees which he had prepared to receive it, and so judiciously, that those twelve trees being in severall places, and in the midst of many others which were rubbed with the same composition, immediatly all that wood which seperated the two passes was in a flame, Cyrus making his assault at the same time that the fire began, the enemy was strangely surprized, yet since he who commanded that pass, was a very brave and gallant men, he made a stout resistance, in hopes that the fire would not run through the wood, and in hopes he should be releived by Aripithes who was at the other pass, but he was deceived in his hopes, for the conflagrati|on was so great, that never was object more full of terrou| and astonishment.

In the mean time, since the wind wa|ted the flames towards that side on which Aripithes was they never hindred the march of Cyrus his troops, so as they had all fire on their left hand without any trouble unto them; but on the contrary it helped them in their way with light, and was a terrou| to the enemy they were to fight Page 77 withall Not but that this valiant Commander who had the Guard of that pass, and was a Sauromate by birth, did most courageously oppose Cyrus; And Aripithes on his side being advertised of the Assault which was made upon that Pass, he would needs come in person to defend it: but the flames being an obstacle unto him, he was forced to go a great way about to oppose the passage of Cyrus: but this great Prince did not give him any time for it; for seeing that the valiant Sauromate whom he had before him, would rather perish then forsake the Pass which he guarded, he would needs make the assault in person, and fell on so courageously, that he forced him to give ground. And as those who fight retrying do not alwaies preserve their usuall judgment; so this valiant Sauromate retired towards the Wood which was on fire, yet since Cyrus conceived that by driving him further, he should leave the passage so open unto his Troops, that Mazares & Mysriles might pass whilst he was fighting; he did force him on so vigorously, as it might in some sort be sayd he did drive him too far. And indeed this couragious Sauromate seeing himself and his men in a most terrible extremity, he turned his valour into despair, and did such prodigious Acts of Valour, as Cyrus was never in all his life in so much danger as now: And that you may the better know into what danger this great Prince was exposed; be pleased to know that driving those valiant Sauromates towards the inflamed Trees, in hopes to force them to yeild themselves, he also had engaged himself in the fire; for since the Souldiers who did according to the commands of the Ingeneir, he unluckily prepared some Trees to receive the fire in a place where he did not command them, and where Cyrus did not think any had been prepared, so it chanced that the fire took hold of these Trees, insomuch as Cyrus who was fighting with the Sauromates, was upon a sudden in the midsts of fire and flashing flames; yet he was so fully resolved to vanquish this va|iant Sauromatan Comm|ander, that he still pursued him: Never was Combate more terrible then this; the great light which was in all the Wood, did make a strange fury appear in the coun|tenances of the Combatants: Their Arms did glisten exceedingly, and the fire and smoak together did so alter objects, as Cyrus was hardly knowable; But though he could not be known by the colour of his Complexion, yet he was by his valour. In the mean time, the flames increased, and the blows of Cyrus falling thicker, the Sauromates to avoid them, did run into that part of the Wood which was most in flames, and thinking therfore to avoid his pursuit, a huge Tree did fall and gave a stop unto their flight, so as they dyed in a most horrid manner. Moreover the hor|ses being frighted at this fall of fire, they carried their Masters into the most dange|rous places of the Combate, these miserable Animals choosing rather to avoid the flames then their Riders Enemies: The rumbling of the wind which blew the flames a|ded unto the crackling of leaves, the falling of fiery Trees, and to the scribes of dying and vanquished men, did make a noise more hideous and terrible then the murmuring of the enraged Sea and most loud thunder together could do. Cyrus thus being in thi| condition, at last saw all his Enemies dead, except that valiant Sau|romate whom he desired to overcome and one other, and he saw himself abando|ned by those few men which followed him, not that they were fled, but the fall of an enflamed Tree having separated them from Cyrus, they knew not how to come at him again; so as this great Prince was alone in the midst of fire and flames, against two most terrible Enemies. However in lieu of being astonished, he became more valiant and hardy, and fought it out with such strange vigour, that he vanquished the two Sauromates, for he ran the one thorough the body, and wounded the other in his right arm and thigh, and came with such fury upon him, that he overthrew his horse, which to avoid the flames left his Master wounded and disarmed, for his Sword broke in the fall, so that getting up again with much |do, he saw himself at the mercy of this Conquerour, and at the mercy of the fire. But Cyrus being infi|nitely admired for his valour and clemency: when this Sauromate had yeilded him|self, and Cyrus saw him without Armes, or Horse, or power to walk, he let him get up behind him, purposely to shew him the way through this enflamed Wood and Laborinth of fire (as I may call it) in which he was engaged. So this valiant Prisoner accepting the offer of his illustrious Conqueror, he got up behind him, and turning somtimes to the right hand, and somtimes to the left, to avoid the flames Page 78 and fall of Trees, they came at last to the place where Mazares and Mysriles had drawn up their Troops, not taking any care for him, because they imagined that he was returned unto the entrance of the Wood, as soon as he was assured of the pas|sage: But he was no sooner with them, then they understood from the mouth of his Prisoner what Miracles he had done, and how generous he was in saving his life. However the better to merit the Commendations which his Prisoner had g|IVEN him, he caused him to be set on hors-back behind Ortagues who had orders to carry him unto the Fort of Sauromates, to see him dressed, and to have a great care of him: Afterwards this great Prince left Mazares and Mysriles to bring all the Troops through the passage, whilst he himself went beyond the Wood, and drew them up into Battaglia as they passed, least Aripithis or Ariantes should come charge them in disorder. And to act with as much Prudence as Courage he did not dis|furnish that Quarter which was neer the other passage, but guarded that which he had already passed, that he might make use of it upon all occasions.

In the mean time, he had no reason to fear his being assaulted; for the fiering of the Wood and the noise of Cyrus his passage had put the Enemy into such a terri|ble dismay, as they were not in any condition to make any attempts; so that withi|n two hours after the Sun was up, Cyrus was gotten on the other side of the Wood in the head of his Army, drawn all up into regular Battaglia, with the loss of a very inconsiderable number of men.

ARTAMENES, OR, THE GRAND CYRUS. THE TENTH AND LAST PART. AND SECOND BOOK.

AS Fortune is pleased to entail happy Events upon some, and Miseries after misery upon others, after her own Capritious humour; So Cyrus had not only the ad|vantage to pass his Army, but he had also the joyes to know that Ciaxares had sent him a very considerable body both of Horse and Foot; and he understood also that Tigranes and Spitridates would arise within three daies at the Town where the Princess Onesile and the Princess Aramenta Quartered, and by consequence to have two of the most valiant men in the world in his Army. But whilst he had these Consolations, Thomyris who was come unto her troops which were not far off from the Vanguard of Cyrus, was in a most incredible despair, when she saw the Army of an Enemy whom she could not choose but love, and when she saw it had passed those straights which she hoped to have kept untill all the rest of her Forces were come up which she expected, so as never thinking of defending or guarding the Passes she called back the Troops of Aripithes, and was extremely offended at him, though he was in no fault, yet she chid him as if he could have kept the Wood from being burnt; or as if he could have marched through the flames to relieve them whom Cyrus assaulted.

In the mean time, the wood continued still burning, and Thomyris beheld the flames from off a little Hill, thinking all the Horizon that way had been circled with a girdle of fire. The truth is, the Conflagration was so great that if the wind had not ceased upon a sudden, it had not been so soon exstinguished. But at last, the Page 80 Air being serene and calm the fire did not communicate it self, but as soon as those trees which were on fire were consumed, the fire extinguished of it self, so that after this, that wood which was so pleasant and delightfull, was become one of the most affrighting objects in the world; for besides the great heap of cindars, and extin|guished coales, which might be seen, one might behold some trees standing, but without leaves or branches, only stumps blasted though not burnt down, so as it was become a terrou| to the pritty birds which harboured in it, and could not fa|ford them the branch of one tree for an umbrage. Cyrus also could see the Fort of Sauromates from his camp, and indeed the place was so altered, that it seemed not the same it was

In the mean time, Though Cyrus had a great desire to march towards Tho|myris, yet he durst not advance any further, untill he had ammunition for his army, and though he was not far off from Thomyris, yet he knew he could not force her to fight, because of a little river which favored her retreat. And indeed, Ariantes thinking it not expedient to fight untill all the |orces which Thomyris expected were joyned, he set some troops to defend the Ford over that river, and retired himself neer the Tents Royall, intrenching himself so advantageously, that it was very dan|gerous to assault him: After which they held a counsell of war, wherein it was re|solved, to hazard a battel, as soon as those forces which they expected were arriv|ed.

On the other side, Thomyris and Ariantes were like to fall out again, for that Queen seeing that Mandana's guards were more affectionate unto Ariantes then unto her, she intended to change them; to the end, that if she lost the battel, yet she might have that Princess in her power, and to make use of her, either for her revenge or for her safety. But since Ariantes was no lesse afraid that Mandana should fall under the power of Thomyris, then under the power of Cyrus, he did so earnestly oppose her design of changing him who commanded Mandana's guard, that she durst not persist in her resolution, in a time when the least division in her army might make them easily overcome.

However, since she |ent severall orders to hasten up the troops, they made such hast, that they came unto the generall Rendezvouz, before Cyrus was in a condition to advance, and arrived without any danger, for being beyond the |ents Royall, Cyrus could not hinder them from joyning But this great Prince was so ex|treamly impatient of fighting, that as soon as all things necessary for the su|istance of his army were ready, he marched toward the Enemy, who for a time disputed the passage over the river, but at last they left it, and Cyrus causing im|mediatly, many bridges to be made with faggots and planks, for the passage of his Infantry, he got over all his army in a day and a half, and put them into battle ar|ray. But as he was just ready to march, the wise and virtuous Anacharsis came un|to him who seeing things at the very last extreamity beseeched Cyrus to let him go and feel the pulse of Thomyris once more: For Sir (said he unto him) I con|ceive that Mandana will be in more danger if she loo|e the battell, then if you lost it. Could you persw|de me of that (replied Cyrus) I think that I should suffer my self to be overcome. However it be Sir (replied Anacharsis) I conceive |hat to make the gods propitious unto you it is requisite that you take such a course as that you may not be accused of all the blood which will be spilt in this battell, which you are going to fight, and therefore I beg of you three days to try what my last endeavours can do: I must confess wise Anacharsis (replied Cyrus) I can|not chuse but wonder you should have any hopes that Thomyris will <...> g her mind: But since I cannot deny such a man as you I am contented you should |ee Thomyris, though I conceive it is against my honour to talk of any peace, after such advantages as I have gotten. On the contrary Sir (replyed Anacharsis) Conque|rours may make propositions of peace with honour it is only the conquered who can demand it with shame, nor would I go unto this Queen as an En|oy from you Sir, but only as a bare Mediatour, and as a man who seriously considers the losse of so many brave men, as must needs be lost in the battell; so passing for no more then a Mediatour, between you and Thomyris, you may both of you deny what I shall propound if you have a mind, but however I will never be upbraided with negle|cting any thing that may stop the effusion of so much innocent blood as needs must Page 76 be spilt, be the War never so just After this Cyrus being unwilling to deny A|nacharsis who sayd he would not retard his design above three dayes, he told him that he consented unto it; And commanding a Herald to conduct him, this wise Scythian went unto Thomyris. As soon as he came unto the first of her Troops he was stopped and that Princess being immediately advertised of his Arrival, she ima|gined that this virtuous Scythian was come more at the instance of Cyrus then his own, so as flattering up her self in a false grounded hope, she commanded he should be very civilly used and brought unto her.

In the mean time, Anacharsis knowing that things difficult are never brought to pass at first, he resolved to behave himself so as that Queen might imagine that he did not tell her all he had in commission to impart, to the end that still hoping for more she might not suddenly send him away as she was wont, but might give him time to tell her all his reasons, and might let him speak with Ariantes also: And indeed this Sage Scythian carried himself with so much Prudence that Thomyris did hearken unto him very plausibly, and he tempered her spirit, that he wanted but a little of perswading her, that if she would set Mandana at liberty she might hope Cyrus would change his mind; yet he spake nothing which might positively be so interpreted; but telling her in general, she could never be happy as long as she was unjust; Her prepossessed imagination did so deceive her, that she demanded a Truce the second time: So that Anacharsis returning unto Cyrus, and coming back again unto Thomyris. A Truce was concluded for five daies before any of either side knew why it was made, or upon what they would treat. However, made it was, and all well meaning persons about Thomyris and Ariantes were busier then ever to inspire their thoughts with more just resentments then those which love gave them. As for Cyrus there was no question but he would yield unto peace with Thomyris, provided she would restore Mandana.

But whilst all these useless Negotiations were transacting, Spitridates and Tigranes came unto the Town where Onesile and the Queen of Pontus were; And Fortune at last as averse as she had been, unto Araminta and Spitridates permitted them the joyes of seeing each other again: yet the interview of these four persons had some sadness mixed with their satisfactions; for it was impossible for them to meet without remembrance of the King of Pontus his death, and of that of Phraortes, and that with thoughts suitable to the cruelty of their Fates. But the Princess Onesile did so manage the matter that their joyes were above their sorrows. After they had talked along time in Onesiles Chamber, Araminta going unto her own, Spitridates waited upon her, and had private conference with that Princess, whom he had never seen, since he caused her to get out of Cabira whether Artanus had carried her and from whence she intended to go into Armenia, where she thought the King of Pontus her brother was: He not being able to express his joyes at the sight of that fair, virtuous, and charming Princess, after so many misfortunes he made his complaints unto her in a most passionate manner. I see, Madam (said he unto her) that miseries are inseparable from Spitridates, since I am extremely grieved that my words are not able to express my joyes that I have the honour once more to see you I assure you, Sir (replied Araminta most obligingly, that to imagine your joyes, I need only measure them by my own Ah, Madam (said Spitridates) as obliging as your Language is, yet I am sure it is unjust; for it is not possible you should be so glad to see me again, as I am to see you, and to have the liberty of telling you all the Torments that I have endured: you have had one Sir, (answered she and half smiled) which I advise you not to remember me of, for after so many reasons of commending you, I have no mind to complain against you I understand you very well Madam (said he unto her) you would know all the Torments which the unfortunate Spitridates hath endured when he was a Wanderer, a Fugitive, a Prisoner wounded and absent; but you would not hear of the Torments which he endured when he was so bold as to be jealous: And yet he hath been more miserable by reason of his jealousy then by all the rest of his misfortunes: But, Madam, since it is your pleasure to have it so, I will submit, and will not excuse my weakness, but ask a pardon for it, and will undergo any punishment you shall please to inflict.

Afterwards these two illustrious persons calling unto memory all the adventures Page 82 which had befallen them from their Infancy until now, they found the number of them so great, that they admired how they were able to endure them, and they had seen so great an example of giddy Fortunes inconstancy, as they durst not assure themselves of any long continuance of the happiness which they then enjoyed; yet upon second thoughts they believed that since they had now met together, there could not any fortunes befall them worse then before: So as confirming that innocent affection which they had formerly promised, it may very well be said that the knot was faster tyed then ever before. Spitridates not knowing that Cyrus treated Araminta as Queen of Pontus since the death of her Brother, he spoke unto her as acknowledging her so, although her Father was in possession of that Kingdom which gave her that Title; and indeed he behaved himself like a Prince who was worthy to resemble Cyrus, and who indeed did resemble him as near in the Qualities of his Soul, as in the Features of his Face. On the other side, the particular discourse between Tigranes and Onesile was with as much tender, solid, and sincere affection, as could possibly be found in two persons who loved most dearly: For Tigranes had not renounced all the Civilities and respects of a Lover, though he was the husband of the admirable Onesile: The fair Telagene had also a share in the joyes of these two illustrious Persons; and the wise Hesionide was so glad to see Spitridates again, that Araminta her self could not be more.

In the mean time, since Spitridates and Tigranes understood that there was a Treaty in agitation, they made no such hast in going unto Cyrus: But Onesile conceiving that if the Army of this Prince should move further off, Araminta and she should hear seldomer from those who were so dear unto them, she propounded unto the Queen of Pontus, to go unto the Fort of Sauromates of which Cyrus was Master, and there wait the Success of the War: Araminta liking the motion, they propounded it afterwards unto Tigranes and Spitridates, who not thinking of any danger unto the Princesses in that place, and finding it very convenient for them if the War continued, they thanked them for their intentions, and prepared to wait upon them thither; and so they departed the next morning: But to the end they might be received unto the Fort without any stop, Tigranes sent to acquaint Cyrus with the intentions of the Queen of Pontus and the Princess Onesile, so as that Prince being very glad of the news, he gave all necessary orders for their fit reception into that Fort, preparing himself to make a visit unto these Princesses, since the Treaty would permit him, and since it was not above four hours riding between his Camp & the Fort; and he was so quick in his business, that Tigranes and Spitridates intending to come unto the Camp, were not set out of the Fort when he arrived; so as being much ashamed they should be thus prevented, they went to meet him, and assured him that had they not thought he had been busie about the Treaty, they would not have stayed so long before they had kissed his hand. I come not hither, Sirs, (answered that Prince) to receive excuses for a business which desires none, but only to participate of your joyes which you have both given and received to and from the most excellent Princesses in the world. Afterwards Cyrus asked them why they stayed so long in the Port where they landed, and they told him that at first, it was to put themselves into an equipage fit for coming into the Army, and that afterwards they stayed there a while, to know whether the great reports of a Rebellion in Bythnia were true or no, but hearing no certainty of it came at last to the place where love and honour did invite them.

After this Cyrus and Spitridates making a short repetition of both their misfortunes, Cyrus most obligingly told that Prince how he was very glad that he did not resemble him in one thing. It is so glorious, Sir, to resemble you in all (replied Spitridates) that I wonder you should say so: Doubtless you will agree with me (said Cyrus) as soon as I have told you that you have great reason to be well satisfied in being no further off the Princess you love as I am off her whom I adore, but that you may be no longer from her (said he most sweetly) let me carry you unto her, and so Cyrus went unto the Chamber of that Princess with whom was Onesile: The sight of this Prince did so surprise Araminta, that she could not choose but blush in remembrance of that unjust Jealousie which Spitridates apprehended; yet since she knew him to be perfectly cured, she presently recollected her self, and the conversation was that day very agreeable.

Page 83 The Prince Indathesis, Atergatis, Silamus, Mneseperheses, and Chersias, did wait upon Cyrus this little journey, so as it was impossible that so many excellent wits should be together, and their discourse not be infinitely pleasing. Spitridates and Intaphernes embraced each other by the orders of Cyrus, and so did Atergatis and Spitridates, from whom that Prince understood that it was they, who had delivered Araminta.

But Cyrus intending to dine at the Fort, after he had made his first visit unto the Princesses, he would make a second unto the King of Hircania, who was brought thither after he had received his wounds in the last battell; afterwards he would go and see the valiant Sauromate also, whose life he had saved after he had vanquished him, by carrying him out of the flames, in which he had perish <...> did, had not his generosity saved him. but in going thither, one of the Guard belonging to the Fort, brought two men unto him, who said they were sent thither. And Cyrus was very gladly surprized to see that one of them was the jealous Leontidus: Also he no sooner perceived him, but he went and very kindly embraced him.

Dear Leontidus, (said he unto him after the first complement) I pray tell me whether I must owe my joyes of seeing you, unto your jealousy, or unto my good fortune? Truly Sir (replied he) I know not well unto whom I owe the honour I have to see you, but I come hither, because the Prince Thrasibulus sent me, because my own inclination invited me, and because my bad fortune hath driven me from Alcidae, before I have had experience of the worst kind of jealousy, and yet I think replied Cyrus, that you have had experience of all sorts that are, for you have been jealous of Policates, who was your superiour, and of Hyparchus who was your inferiour in all things. I think (I say) you have been jealous of a man who was your friend, and of another who was your enemy, and had tryall of all sorts of jealousy under the sun.

There was only one kind (replied he) but since it is the most terrible of all, I have no mind to expose my self unto it. When we are in a place more convenient (replied Cyrus) and when I have more leisure, you shall instruct me with the conclusion of your adventure, but in the Interim I pray tell me how fares the Prince Thrasibulus, and the fair Alcionide? they are both of them so happy in each other, replied Leontidus, that nothing can trouble their felicity unless the thought of your misfortunes, and of that, they are very sensibly grieved; also they both of them charged me to tell you, how sadly they think themselves concerned for you, and the Prince Thrasibulus in particular commanded me to make a tender unto you of all that is in his power, & I left him in a resolution of coming to serve you in person, if he understood from me that the war was like to last long, and to send him word how the true state of things doth stand, was his chief reason of his sending me unto you.

After this, and after Cyrus had returned a very obliging answer, unto the kindness of Thrasibulus he thought upon his design of visiting that valiant Sauromate, whose life he had saved: So as Leontidus followed him with the other who was with him, whom he presented unto Cyrus as his friend, whose name was Democedes, and they were witness of the discourse between this generous Conquerour and this brave prisoner, and they took greater delight in it, because it was in Greek, their natural language. As for Cyrus, it was no wonder to them, he should speak it, as well as his own but they were extremely astonished to hear a Sauromate speak Greek and they could not choose but express their admiration unto one another. Cyrus half hearing them, and half guessing what they said, he told that valiant Prisoner who still kept his bed; that he was much honoured in being commended by Grecians, and such as were the most accomplished men in all Greece; for Leontidus is such a one of my own knowledge, and Democedes in being his friend must needs be the like. If Democedes had no other advantage then in being my friend (replied Leontidus) he would have gotten that great opinion which is due unto his merit; But Sir, when I shall have acquainted you that he is the intimate and particular friend of Sapho, and that he is brother unto the dearest friend of that famous Lesbian, I believe you will think the commendations which he gives, are of a far greater value than mine. How said Cyrus, is Democedes the friend of Sapho, and brother unto the fair Cydnon, whom I saw at Mytilene: yes Sir, (replied Democedes) Page 84 I am the brother of Cydnon, and the friend of Sapho, who have <...> d a thousand times of the illustrious Artamenes. For you know Sir, that when you landed at Lesbos, you went under that name. I beseech you do me the favour (replied Cyrus) to tell me in what condition that illustrious person is? Sir, (replied Democedes) I cannot well tell, for I come into Scythia to see if I can hear any news of her: If you only desire to know how she does (replied the prisoner) I am able to shorten your journey, for it is not long since I saw her, you do both of you so much surprise me, (replied that Prince) as I cannot tell what I should think: For Democedes, says he, came into Scythia to see Sapho, and at Sauromates, says he) I, saw her not long since, and if the last of these be true, (said Democedes,) I should be very glad of it. and if what you say be true, replied Cyrus, I should think it very strange: For how could Sapho leave her own country, and come unto one so far distant? The adventure of that admirable Lady is so extraordinary (replied he) as nothing can be as stranger; yet her life is not filled with such great events, as commonly happen unto persons of a higher fortune than she is of. But for all that, there is something so singular and particular in her fate, as that it may very well be said, such things have hapned unto Sapho, as never hapned unto any: Happen what will (replied that valiant Sauromate, whose name was Mezontes, I am able to tell you of some things which you cannot know without me.

Cyrus was extremely desirous to know what both of them knew, but since he was afraid of making the Queen of Pontus and the Princess Onesile stay over long, he left Democedes with Mereontes, conjuring him to tell at better leisure, what he had heard and knew concerning Sapho; after which he went unto the Princesses. Onesile who was giving an excellent judgment upon a question in dispute, the Princess Araminta to commend her said, that she did not think that the famous Sapho who was so talked of over all the world, could judge better upon verses, than shee could do of every thing, so this giving Cyrus an occasion to speak of her, he told them all that he heard of that illustrious person, and commended her so highly, that they were confident she did merit that reputation which she had: So as much desiring to know her adventures, they beseeched Cyrus, that he would intreat Democides to relate them; so as coming with Leontidus and many others into Ariaminta's chamber, presently after dinner, Cyrus acquainted him with the curiosity of the Princesses, and desired him to give them that satisfaction. yet since there is a necessity of my returning to the Camp, (continued he) I must needs ask you whether the relation will be long and whether it will be told in the compass of two hours? Sir, (replied he) one may if he please, epitomize the largest history into that time, and I will engage my self Sapphoes shall be no longer, though there be many long discourses which I ought not to omit if you desire these Princesses should very well know the life of this excellent person. Since time is so precious said Ariaminta, let us not loose it; but to the end this story may be better heard, let us go into my closet, So Araminta, Onesile, Cyrus, Telagenes, Spitridates, and Indithyrus, went into a little Tent, which she used as a closet, and all the rest staid with Intaphernes, and Atergatis, and Tygranes, who discoursing upon this conflagration which helped the army of Cyrus unto an easie passage, they never thought of following them. However, these six persons were no sooner in a place with Democedes, but Cyrus intreated him to begin his relation; but I beseech you (said he) since these Princesses do not know Sappho, only by reports, tell them exactly who she is, before you acquaint them with her adventures; for doubtless nothing doth more attract the spirits of those who are to hear the history, than to make them well acquainted with the person whom it concerns. The commands you impose upon me Sir, replied Democedes, are very hard to be obeyed; for it is not so easie a matter to draw the picture of the heart, and mind; and all the inclinations of a person, as it is to draw the picture of her face, since there is requisite a certain spirit of discernment, which does know to find out a difference between things semblable, and things real, and without which, one cannot make a true resemblance: He ought to know how to distinguish all the severall degrees of melancholly, and mirth, and not content himselfe to say in generall, that such a one is serious, or such a one is merry, as many men do; for certainly there are a thousand petty observations Page 85 to be made, which make a great difference in tempers which seem not opposite, yet that it is which makes the resemblance true: For as all women, who have great, gray, and sweet eyes, do not resemble one another, so there are a million of persons of whom the same things may also be said, which yet do not resemble one another, neither in their minds nor faces, and therefore as I said before, it is requisite to have the art of putting a difference, between the melancholick and the serious, and between the diverting and the merry, when one will draw such a picture as requires neither pensills nor colours, I perceive by what you say (replied Onesile) that when you have shewed us the picture of Sappho, I shall know her better than I do my self. Though I have the advantage to know that admirable Lady, (replied Cyrus) yet I am confident that you will know her better by Democides than I do.

To spend no time in commending the painter, who must draw this fine piece, (said Spitridates) I beseech you oblige him to begin his work. Araminta seconding Spitridates, Democedes began his relation, addressing his speech unto the Queen of Pontus,

THE HISTORY OF SAPHO.

SINCE it is very naturall for every one to commend such things in which themselves have interests, I think Madam, it will plead my excuse, if in commending the admirable Sappho, I also commend her country, because it is my own; and if in observing unto you all the advantages of her birth, I tell you, that she was born in one of the most delectable places in the world. The very truth is Madam, The Isle of Lesbos is both so pleasant, and so fertile, as the Egean sea hath none comparable unto it: This Isle is bigg enough in some places to make one think it is joyned to the Continent, but it is none of those which are so mountainous as they seem to be, only a huge masse of rocks in the midst of the sea: Nor is it like some of those which having no rising ground in them, seem always exposed unto fury of the waves, which environ them: But on the contrary, the Isle of Lesbos, can boast of all the varieties which any great kingdome joyned to the continent, can produce. For towards the East, it hath mountains and great woods, and towards the West, meadows and pleasant plaines. The aire there is pure and healthy, the goodness of the ground produceth plenty: commerce is great and free, and the Continent so neer towards Phrygia, that in two hours one may when they please see a forraigne Court. Moreover, Mytilene the Metropolis, is so excellently well built, and hath two such goodly ports, that strangers admire them, and find much delight in staying there.

This Madam, is the place of Sappho's birth, The wise Pittacus is the Prince of it, and attracts an infinite number of accomplished men. He had a son called Tysander, a man the most rarely qualified in the world, and who did contribute much to the pleasure of the place, yet since it is long since he dyed, I shall speak no more of him, though he was one of Sapphoes Adorers.

Now Madam, after I have acquainted you with the place of her birth, I will say something of her quality, she was the daughter of a man of note, called Scamandogenes of so noble a race, that no family in Mytilene could shew a longer or more unquestionable pedigree: Sappho again had the advantage to be the daughter unto a Father and Mother, who were persons of great spirits and virtue, but she was so unfortunate as to loose them so soon, as she received from them only her first inclinations unto goodness, for she was but six years of age when they dyed, tis true, they left Page 86 her under the tuition of a Cousin, who had all requisite qualities for the education of a young person, and they left her an estate much below her merit, yet enough, not to stand in need unto any; nay more, to appear very decent and handsomely in the world.

Yet she had a brother called Charaxes, who was left very rich: For Scamandrogines when he dyed, divided his Estate very inequally, and left much more unto his sonne then his daughter, though, to say truth, he did not deserve it, and though she deserved a Crown. Indeed Madam, I do not thinke all Greece ever had a person so comparable unto Sappho, yet I shall not now relate unto you any passages of her infancy: for she was so very little while a Child, that at twelve years of age, she was spoken of as a person whose beauty, spirit, and judgment were already ripe, and made all the world to wonder: only thus much let mee tell you, that never was in any found, inclinations more noble, nor a greater aptnesse to learn any thing she desired to know.

However, though Sappho was charming even from her very Cradle, yet I will draw you the picture of her person and mind, only as she is at this present, to the end you may the better know her. Give me leave to tell you then Madam, that though you here speak of Sappho as the most charming person of all Greece, yet you must not imagine her to be one of those, in whom Envy cannot finde a fault: But yet you must know, that though she be none of those which I speak of, yet she is able to inspire greater passions then the greatest beauty of the Earth: And though she sayes she is very low, when she would detract from her selfe, yet she is of a reasonable stature: but so noble, and so well made as possibly can be desired. As for her Complexion, it is none of the highest Lustre, yet so well, as none can say but that she is very faire: But her eyes are so unexpressably lovely, so fine, so sweet, so quicke, so amorous, and so sprightly, as the lustre of them strikes to the very heart of those she looks upon: The truth is, they sparkle like fire, and yet have such a passionate sweetness, as shews that Vivacity and Languor are not things incompatible in the eyes of Sappho: That which made their greatest lustre was, that there never was a greater opposition then was between the black and white of her eyes, and yet this great opposition did not cause any harshnesse to appear in them: but there was such an amorous kind of spirit which did sweeten them in such a charming manner, as I do not believe there was ever any person, whose looks were more dreadfull. Moreover, she had many things which are seldome found together: For her physiognomic was both subtle and modest, and yet she had a kind of grandure and haughtinesse in her Garbe and Aire: Her face was oval, her mouth little and redd, and her hands so admirable, as if they were made to take hearts; or if you knew how dearly she loved the Muses, you would say they were worthy to gather the fairest slowes of Parnassus. But Madam, these are not they which make Sappho most amiable: For the charms of her wit do infinitely transcend those of her beauty: And indeed it is of so vast an extent, as it may most truly be said, that what she understands not; cannot be reach'd by any other: And she is so wonderfully apt to learn any thing, that she hath made it her owne, before you would think she began to learn

First, she had naturally an inclination to compose verse; and she has so happily improved her selfe, as none whoever excels her: And she hath invented such singular measures, as Hesiod and Homer were ignorant of; and have found such an approbation in the world, as they that bear the name of the inventor unto this day and are called Saphiques.

She wrote also most admirably in Prose, and there was an amorous Character upon all the works of this rare Lady, that she moved and softened the hearts of all such as read what shee writ. I have seen her compose a Song upon a sudden, which was a thousand times more moving then the mourning Elegie could be; and her wit had such an amorous way with it; as none other besides her selfe ever had. She expressed her selfe in such things as were most difficult, most delicately: And she knew so well how to read an Anatomy Lectur upon an amorous heart (fit be lawfull to say so) that she could make an exact description of all its jealousies, all its inquietudes, all its impatencies, all its joyes, all its disgusts, its murmures, Page 87 its dispaire, its hopes, its feares, its revols, and all the tumultuous imaginations of it.

Moreover, the most admirable Sappho did not only know what belonged to matters of Love, but also much better what belonged to matters of generosity: Indeed she knew so perfectly how both to write and speak of every thing, that there was nothing which did not come within the compass of her knowledge; and yet one would not imagine it a knowledge infused: for Sappho had seen all that was worthy of sight, and took much pains to be instructed in all that was worthy of curiosity.

Moreover she played upon the Lute, and sung passing well, she danced with an excellent grace, and would divert her self and others most admirably in a harmless Rallie; and which was most admirable in her: This person who was so knowing in so many severall things knew them without the least spark of ostentation or pride, and without scorning those who knew them not; her discourse is so naturall, so free, so easie, so gallant, as one should never hear her talk in generall Company, but of such things as a person of a good wit might talk of without having studied for what she knew: Not but that knowing men might see that Nature alone could not arrive at that height she did; but it was because she was so careful to keep her self within the Sphere of her own Sex, as she almost never spoke of any thing but such as was within the compass of a Ladies knowledge, and it was to her very singular good friends, that she would impart the depth of her knowledge unto: yet it must not be imagined that Sappho affected any gross kind of ignorance in her Conversation: But on the contrary, she was full of witty and pleasant conceits.

Moreover, shee could speak so singularly well, both unto things serious, and things gallant and Airie; as it was admired one person should have talents so opposite. But what is most worthy of commendations in Sappho is, that in the whole world there was not a Person fuller of goodness then shee; nor more generous, nor more officious, nor less interested. Again, her friendship was full of fidelity: her soule was so tender, and her heart so passionate, that questionlesse, it was asupream felicity to be the friend of Sappho: for she had such an ingenious spirit, and such a witty way of inventing new means to oblige those whom shee esteemed, and to: make them know her affection, that though shee seemed not to do any extraordinary thing, yet she perswaded them that she loved them dearly: shee was absolutely incapable of envie: And she would do Justice unto any merit, with so much generosity, that she took greater delight in commending others, then in being commended. Besides all this, shee was full of complacency, which without the least dram of basenesse in it, was infinitely agreeable: and if shee at any time denied her friends, she did it with so much civility and sweetness, that she obliged them by her denial: and imagine, I pray, how she would oblige them if she should grant them her friendship and confidence. This Madam, is the composition of the rare Sappho, whose Brother is fraught with inclinations far different from those of his admired Sister: Not but that Charaxes hath some qualities which are good, but with all, he hath many bad ones.

He had courage indeed out it was a bestiall courage, such as makes a Dog more valiant then a Deer, and not such a generous valour as is requisite in a compleat man. But Madam, this rare woman being so accomplished as I have described her, she made so great a rumour in Mytilene, notwithstanding all her modesty, and care to conceale her knowledge that fame carried her name throughout all Greece, and that so gloriously, that untill then, never any of her sex had so great a reputation.

The greatest wits of the world were greedy of her Verses, and all Greece preserved them with care and admiration, yet she did impart them with so much difficulty, and seemed to value them so little, that it augmented her glory. Moreover, one could never know what times she took to make them, for she was a daily visitor of her friends, and one should hardly ever see her either read or write: and she was so good a disposer of her time, that she had some of her self, and some for her friends. Moreover, she was such an absolute Mistressse of her own mind, that what care soever were in her soule, they never appeared in her eyes, unless Page 88 it was her mind they should. But Madam, I have not said enough yet of the most admirable Sappho; for I must furt er tell you to the end you may the better perceive her judgment, that there were some Persons whom she honoured with her Amity. And amongst the rest there were foure who had the principall shares in her diversions: The first was called Amithone: The second Erinne: the third Athys, and the fourth Cydnon my sister.

However, though 't be not handsome to commend such as are neere allyed unto us, with her same sincerity and applause as others, yet to the glory of Sapho, I shall speak of them all very advantageously. For since Cydnon was her first friend, it is but just I should justify her choice.

And to begin the description of these four, give mee leave to tell you, that Almithone, was a very big woman, of a very advantageous stature, and a goodly presence; who though not rarely faire, yet she attracted looks, and pleased infinitely: her humour was sweet and agreeable, she spoke most elegantly, and without any learning but what she gleaned from the discourse of Sapho, and such accomplished men as talked with her, she understood things of most deep and difficult knowledge. And the great naturall parts which the gods had given her, together with the society of learned people, enabled her to speak with much judgement.

As for Erinne, it was otherwise with her, for her wit and ingenuity was all cultivated with abundance of care: so as though her naturall endowments were not so great as those of Amithone, yet Art had so supplid the deficiency of Nature, that her company was infinitely charming. Her fancy would not reach so high as Amithones, yet she would compose good verse; and if the modesty of Sapho may be credited, they are to be preferred before hers.

As for the faire Athys, it may well be said, that she had all the goodness of the other two: for she had naturally abundance of wit and did polish it by many noble sciences, and the conversation of all the accomplished men in Mytilene. Sapho also had inspired her with that Aire of modesty which rendred her so charming, insomuch as she could not endure any should tell her, that she knew any thing more then other Ladies did: nor would she ever confesse that she knew any thing, but by the guid onely of common sence, and the usage of the World. Her Person was infinitely charming: Her stature good, her Haire flaxen & light, that it may well be termed faire: The whole proportion of her face was infinitely agreeable: her mouth was a wonder: her nose well proportioned, her eyes sparkling, her Aire modest, and her humour sweet.

However though these three Ladies were most admirable, yet Cydnon was more loved by Sapho, then they all three. And further then this Madam. I know not how to give you my own Sisters Picture: and yet I think it is allowable to commend her though only in justification of Saphoes choise, and therefore let me tell you, that all those who use to speak of her beauty, do report her faire and handsome, though she be little and brown, but since it is not by the handsomnesse of her Person, that she got the amity of Sapho, I will speak more of her humour and witt, then of her beauty. Be pleased to know then, that Cydnon is naturally merry, gay, sweet, obsequious and complaisant: she has a certaine spirit of expedition which makes her never find any difficulty, in doing any thing for her friends. Doubtlesse, she was knowing enough in all excellent Sciences, and versed her self in such things as most suited with the humour of Sapho. The mirth of Cydnon, is not excessive, nor at all given to Rallary, unlesse it be in a most innocent manner.

These four Persons, dwelling near Sapho, they were so often together, that they were inseperable. Not but that they visited other Ladies also, but not with such Assiduity as they did her: And the union betwixt them was so great, that none used to invite any one of them unto any feast unless they invited all.

You may imagine Madam, that these Ladies were followed and courted by all the Gallants of the time, which I assure you were no small number, especially when the Prince Tisander the son of Pittacus was in love with Sapho, Since this Prince was her first conquest, I know not whether I shall keep within my prescribed compass, and be a little longer in my story then I resolved, yet I shall not stand to make any exact description of his merit: for since he is dead, that will but serve to Page 87 move pity for his sad fate, only let me tell you thus much, that he was a man who merited the esteem of the Illustrious Cyrus, and his sorrows for him also after death. Tisander then, being a most rarely accomplished man, and in the prime of his youth, there was a great meeting at Mytilene about the marriage of Amithone, who married a man hugely rich, and who for certain reasons of state was much looked upon by Pittacus: who honouring the Feast with his presence, and with the Prince his Son. Tisander then spoke unto the faire Sapho the first time. But his wonder was to find her so sad, though at a Wedding, and the Bride her friend. So that taking occasion at that lovely melancholy which appeared in her eyes to begin acquaintance with her: Perhaps you may think me very bold lovely Sapho (said he unto her) for beginning my discourse with you, as if you had as great a confidence in me as I wish you had, yet I cannot choose but ask you, why you are more serious this day, then I have used to see you in the Temple, where sometimes I had the honour to meet you, for truly, having a long time desired the happinesse to speak unto you, I shall now be exceeding glad to know whether I ought to pity you for any misfortune which hath fallen unto you, to the end I may at the first beginning of our acquaintance, render you some testimony of affection by my sensibility of whatsoever concerns you. Your language Sir is so obliging, replied Sapho, that it deserves I should acquaint you with the cause of my sadnesse, which perhaps you will find so slight, that you will not be much troubled to be a sharer in it, for truly Sir (said she and smiled) I must acquaint you that I never was at any marriage festivall without melancholy, and my mind is so very irregular, that I cannot rejoyce at the happinesse of Amithone though she be one of my dearest friends, and though I am as sensible a person as any is in the world of any joyes which happen unto those I love. Doubtlesse Madam, replied Tysander, then you do not look upon marriage as a happinesse. The truth is Sir, (replied Sapho) I look upon it as a slavery. Then Madam (replied Tysander) do you look upon all men, as Tyrants? I do look upon them (replied she) as men that may be so, as soon as they become husbands. This Imagination comes always into my mind when I am at any marriage, and I am sure, that a melancholy will cease upon me, by reason of that little interest which I have in the happiness of that person who is to be married. I am extremely afraid Madam, replied Tyfander that this your hatred of marriage in particular, should proceed from your hatred of all men in generall, and yet, beleieve me, you would be very unjust, if you should advance your own sex so much above ours. The truth is (continued he) if there were many such women as your self, you had some reason for it, nay if there were only two or three such in the whole world, I should consent unto it. But lovely Sapho (pursued he) since you are the only one in the whole world, who hath found out the Art, to unite all the virtue and all the good qualities of both sexes, in one single person: I beseech you content your self to be esteemed or envied by all women, and so to be adored by all men without hating them in generall.

Since I cannot be unjust (replied she) I know very well, that I ought not to assume unto my self any share in those Praises which you give me, and I know that there are many men so excellently accomplished, as they deserve all my esteem and may obtain some share in my friendship: But as soon as ever I look upon them as Husbands, then I do look upon them as Masters, Masters so apt to become Tyrants, as I cannot choose but at that time to hate them, and to thank the Gods, that they have not given me any great inclination unto that fatal thing, which they call marriage. But, Madam (replied Tisander) when some happy and rarely accomplished man should move your heart, perhaps then you will change your mind. I cannot tell, Sir (replied she) whether I shall change my mind or no; but I am sure, that I had rather even lose my wits then ever lose my liberty; and I am fully resolved never to make my Slave my Tyrant. I am so far from conceiving (replied Tisander) that there can be any one in the world who dares be so bold as to cease obeying you, that I am confident none dare command you. For how can it be imagined that a most admirable Lady who is knowing in all things; Nay, I beseech you. Sir (said Sapho and modestly interrupted him) do not speak thus, for I know so very little, that I know not whether I have any reason for what I say. As soon as Page 90 she had said so, one calling away Tisander about some business, he was forced to leave Sapho, but he left his heart with that fair One, nor was this love long concealed; for Tisander being young, and of a quality which attracted many eyes upon him, every one did presently perceive his love unto Sapho, for he went unto her the next day after the marriage of Aminothe and was obsequious and Courty to her, as there was no doubt but that he was in love with that most admirable Lady. At that time all manner of Pleasures were in their highest Lustre at Mytilene, and every day had its fresh diversions.

In the mean time, Tisanders Fate being not to get the love of Sapho, and her Fancy could not comply that way, she only esteemed him; and acknowledged the favour of his affection, but could not follow the counsels of her brother who advised her to sacrifice her liberty unto Fortune by answering the love of that Prince. But Sapho naturally hating Marriage, and not affecting Tisander, she would by no means consent unto it, though she were sure she might marry him with the consent of Pittacus. However, since he was still in hopes to win her affection, He courted her with a thousand Entertainments, and filled the Town full of Diversions, insomuch as the little Court was so full of Gallantry as none could be more. Indeed the admirable Sapho had inspired such a spirit of politeness into all that conversed with her, which also did communicate it self unto those who never saw her, as it was a wonder that it should not spread it self through all the Town of Mytilene, and also throughout all the Isle of Lesbos, but it did not; for Envy, Ignorance, and Malignity kept almost half the Town from being benefited by the Conversation of Sapho and her friends. But to say truly she was no looser by not seeing these kind of people, unto whom the Grandure of her spirit and wit was a terror. Few strangers ever came to Lesbos, who went not immediatly unto the admired Sapho, and who went not out charmed with her discourse? And certainly they had reason, for it was impossible for any to talk two hours with her without a high esteem of her, and without a great inclination to love her. Also there was a knot of five or six of us men who were inseperable, and who alwaies waited upon Tisander when he went unto Sapho, and who sometimes went unto her without him, when her severity made him so melancholy, that he would not go.

In the mean time, the ignorant and envious Caball which was opposite unto ours, did talk of us in such pleasant manner, as I cannot think upon it without a little wonder: For they sayd, we never talked of any thing at Saphos but Poetry Philosophy, and mysterious questions, and I think they sayd, that we taught Magick there also. The truth is, these professed Enemies unto all Wit, Sence, Reason, and Virtue are a most dangerous sort of People; for I found that the most rationally amongst all those who shunned Sapho and her friends were a sort of young fine, sturdy, and merry Fellows who made it their brag, that they were no Schollars, and whose ignorant vanity made them so bold as to censure and judge of what they knew not, and who were perswaded that men of parts and wit did nothing but talk of things which they understood not: Thus did they talk of these Persons whom they shunned with much care, and made such extravagant Tales of them, as were most ridiculous unto such as were in their Senses. But besides this generation of people who are capable only of a Vapory and disordered kind of Jollity, there was also a sort of women which I rank together with them who shun the company of Sapho and her friends and who are also full of their own frothy Rallary: Truth is, they are a sort of women who think it their duty to know nothing unless that they are fair, and how to dress themselves; Women I say, who never talk of any thing but Fashions, whose Gallantry consists in eating the Collations which their Gallants bestow upon them, and whose discourse is nothing but most egregious folly.

There was also another generation of Women, who thinking that exact Virtue requires a Lady should know no more than how to be wife unto her Husband, Mother unto her Children, and Mistress of her Family, they think Sapho, and her friends spend too much time in Conversation, and that they ought not to discourse so much upon things which are not of absolute necessity.

There are also some of these men who look upon their wives as the chief Servant in the house, who forbid their Children to read any books but Prayer-books, and Page 91 who will not allow them upon any terms to sing one of Sapho's songs.

Again, there was some both men and women who shunned us, and who, without Injustice cannot be counted amongst the dull herd of beastly people, since they are persons of quality. And indeed, there were some men of ingenious parts, being prepossessed with a false imagination, who beleived our way of living was such, as these ignorant men reported; and who not endeavouring to un-deceive themselves, rested in their error. Truth is, there was one thing which did much contribute unto their implicate beleife: For Madam, be pleased to know, that there was a woman in Mytilene, who having seen Sapho when she was very young, she took up a fancy to imitate her, and she thought that she did imitate her so well, that changing her lodging, she pretended to be the Sapho of her quarter.

But the truth was, shee imitated so scurvily, that never were two persons more n alike. You may be pleased to remember Madam, how I told you, that Sapho, though shee was admirably knowing in all things, yet shee would not make a shew of it, and that her discourse was naturall, easie, free, and gallant. But alas, it was quite contrary with this Lady, whose name was Damophile, for all her pretended imitation of Sapho.

But to make a description of her, and to let you see the difference between these two persons, be pleased to know, that Damophile taking a toy in her head to imitate Sapho, she did not attempt to imitate her in every particular, but only in being as knowing as she was, & thinking she had found out a most mysterious way of getting more reputation than she had, she did all that the other did not. First, She had always about her, five or six severall masters, the least learned of all which, I think did read Astrology unto her, she was continually writing Letters unto such men as made profession of profound learning, and knowledge: She scorned to cast an eye upon an illiterate person; fifteen or twenty books were alwaies upon her Table, and when any came into her chamber, one of them was alwaies in her hand, and I am most certain she had many more books in her closet than ever she looked into, and she read more than ever Sapho had. Moreover, Damophile was all fustian and bigg words, which she pronounced with a grave and imperious tone, though she spoke but of a trifle, whereas Sapho on the contrary, lapped up the most sublime learning in the lowest language.

Moreover, Damophile not thinking that knowledge and learning was compatible with Oconimick affairs, she never medled with any family affairs, but Sapho she looked into every thing, even of the meanest consequence: Again, Damophile did not only speak in the stile of books, but shee would be alwaies talking of books them|selves, and cited Authors in her common talk, as fast as if she were a professor in some famous University. But the rarest passage of all was, that she was suspected to have promised a very favourable ear unto an ill favoured fellow, who had ex|pressed some kind of tender affection to her, upon condition, that he would com|pose a copy of verses, and let her pass for the Author of them, to the end she might resemble Sapho, she sought all manner of opportunities of publishing what she knew, and even tyred people with a relation of her learning, so as I assure you, that as there is nothing more taking and charming than a woman whose mind is furnished with excellent knowledge when she knows how to use it; so there is nothing so ridiculous nor troublesome, than a woman that is foolishly learned.

Damophile, being then such a one as I have described, she was a cause why those people who shunned Sapho and her friends, did imagin that our conversation was like unto that Damophile, who was said to imitate Sapho, so as a thousand odd reports were divulged concerning us, at which we laughed when we heard of them, thinking our selves very happy, that the opinion which these men had of our society, did keep them from troubling us by their presence. As for Tysander, since he was in love, he had much ado to endure these foolish reports; but punished two or three of these wicked scoffers at wit, and handled them sharply that they were forced to quit the Court.

But Madam, To insist no longer upon the love of that Prince, I will only tell you, that after he had tried alwaies possible to winn the heart of Sapho, the Prince Thrasibulus his friend came unto Mytilene, after he had lost his Dominions & all his fleet, having nothing left in the world but only two ships. Yet that Prince Page 92 having a great and resolute soul, after he had been a while at Mytilene, was very desirous to see the admirable Sapho, whom he esteemed very highly.

But Madam, Since Tysanders love is not the principall subject of Sapho's history. I will not insist any longer upon it; but to tell you, that she could not love him, and that he was in such a desperate condition, that he resolved to imbarque with the Prince Thrasibulus when he went from Lesbos, and try if absence could cure him, but he did not depart before he bade adieu unto the admirable Sapho.

Since my sister did know all her secrets, and since she imparted all unto me af|ter his departure from Lesbos, I understood all the passages between them, and how this ad|eu was taken with the finest discourse that ever was. For Sapho car|ried herself so ingenuously, that she perswaded Lysander she was nothing to blame in not answering his affection, and that she had taken almost as much paines in forcing her heart to affect him, as he had to winn her affection: Insomuch as he parted from Sapho without complaining against her, though he parted from her the most sad soule that ever breath'd.

When he was gone from Mytilene, he left a man behind him whose name was Alces, a man of a subtle wit, who also had a notable faculty in Verse, with or|ders to speak of him as oft as he could unto the most admirable Sapho, and in his absence to give him an exact accompt of all passages, to the end he might re|turn if occasions required. To say truth, he could never have chosen a man more assiduously diligent, then he was with the faire Sapho: For he being in love with the charming Athys who was continually with her, it was an easie matter for him to be a faithfull spie unto Tisander; and the fitter for that purpose, because Alces had a nimble and witty boy, and one that was a notable prior into privacies.

In the mean time, Sapho only esteeming Tisander, his absence was no hinderance unto her Diversions, and our society was within a few dayes as jocund as ever it was, and more, for the discontents of Tisander did sometimes make it melancholly. Then were we a knot of five or sixe of us, who had nothing else to do, but to see Sapho every day: Not but that we made many other visits; but to tell you truly they were short ones, and we always returned betimes, to the end we might meet at Saphoes, where Amithone, Erinne, Athys, and Cydnon alwayes were. When the weather was faire, we went to take the Aire, either upon the Sea, or by the Sea side: And when the weather would not permit us, wee stayed at the house of the admirable Sapho, which was as pleasant a seate as was in the world, for her Chamber, her outer Chamber, and her Closet were upon one floore, and looked towards the Sea.

However, to tell you the very truth, few men ever looked upon Sapho, but they loved her, or at least esteemed her above the degree of a friend: And though Alces was in Love with the faire Athys, yet I hav <...> and him confesse, that the esteem he had of Sapho was of a higher nature then that he had of me, though he loved me exceeding well: but certainly there is a kinde of subtle and penetrating fire in the eyes of Sapho, which at least heates, if not burnes all hearts.

Moreover, it must not be imagined that our society was full of Ceremony, for it was all naturall and full of freedome: and if there was any constraint, it was in that we had a continuall desire to commend Sapho, but durst not, because it was offensive to her. Sometimes we should mutinie against her, because she would neither give us, nor shew us any of her verses, but were put to a thousand devices before we could obtaine them.

For my particular, I had the advantage of all the rest; for since she trusted my sister, I saw the excellent works of the admirable Sapho by her meanes: And I did so admire the rarities which she shewed me, and the freenesse of her illustrious friend from all manner of vanity, as I thought it a thing impossible to over-esteeem the most admirable Sapho. For Cydnon shewed me Elegies, Songs, Epigrams, and a thousand other peeces of rare wit, so as I could nor choose but wonder that a womans capacity could possibly reach the height of them; for her verse was so true, her expressions so even, her fancy so noble, and passions so tender, as to think them incomparable was the least I could do. However, this excellent wo|man whose knowledge was superlative in all things, was more modest than those Page 93 who knew nothing: And an accident one day chanced which did plainly evidence the truth of this unto all those who were together in a place where Sapho and Damophile met.

But Madam, the better to acquaint you with the accident, I must tell you, that there was in Mitilene a most rare confort of Musique which the whole Town u|sed to goe and heare at a Lady of qualities house, whether Sapho and all her com|pany went, with the rest of the Ladies: It was an Assembly where the gates were open to all, where acquaintance was not requisite, and where one might see a hundred persons whom they never saw before, nor perhaps ever should see again, and where all sorts of company resorted: Chance had so contrived it, that Sapho sate next Damophile, so that untill the Musique began, she was constrained to hold discourse with her, and with those about her. Damophile never being with|out two or three half witted persons about her, such as make themselves more a|ble then really they are, Sapho was most terribly perplexed, for she stood in fear of none more then that sort of people: and certainly it was not without reason that she feared them that day: For she was no sooner set, but one of Damophilles friends put a Grammaticall question unto her. Unto which Sapho negligently answered; and turning her head the other way, said, that since she never lear|ned to speak but only by custome, she could not give him any answer.

As soon as she had said so, Damophile told her in a low voyce with intolerable impudence, that he would consult with her upon a doubt concerning a verse in Hesiodo, which she did not well understand. I assure you (replied Sapho very modestly and smiled) you would do much better to consult with some body else; for I never use to consult with any but my Mirrour to know what worst becomes me, and therefore I am far unfit to consult upon difficult questions. As soon as she had said so, one came from the other other end of the Room very hastily, and asked whether it was she who made the songs which were going to be sung* I as|sure you (said she, and blusht for anger) that I have done nothing this day but weary my selfe with vexing; for I am so impatient till the Musique begin, that I never wished for any thing in my life more earnestly.

For my part Madam (said one of Damophiles friends) I had much rather heare one of your ingenuous Epigrams than all the Musique: As Sapho was ready to an|swer unto this, another came with a paper in his hand, and d|sired her she would be pleased to read that <...> logie, and give her opinion of it: So as since shee had much rather read the verses of another, then to heare others talk of hers in such an odd manner, she began to read them to her selfe, or at least seemed to do so; for she was so vexed at her place, as that she could not judg of verses though she had attempted it. But that which caused the greatest distraction, was to heare both men and women behind her, talking of her wit, of her verses, and of her learning, shewing her unto others, and every one shooting a fools bolt according to their fancies: One said she did not look like a learned person, others said that she knew more then she would speak: and one man amongst the rest said, that he would not have his Wife so wise as she was: and a woman wished that she had but haf|fer knowledg, so as every one according to their inclinations commended her, or discommended her, whilst she seemed to be intent upon the paper of verses.

In the mean while, Damophile talked with two or three of her half-witted Companions and spake such thundring words, which signified nothing, that they being at last desirous to heare two such opposite persons as Sapho and Damophile talk together, I was the first who desired her whether she would or no to give back the Eloge unto him who gave it unto her, purposely to force her unto this Conference. And indeed Sapho being glad to see me so neer her, because she helped then to a|rk unto none but me, she restored the Eloge unto him who made it, unto whom she said that she had not wit enough to judg, and therefore durst not commend him.

After which, turning her selfe towards me; well Democedes (said she unto me in a low voyce) Though I was very unhappy in sitting so neer Damophile and her friends, yet I am very glad you came to my reliefe: Nay, nay Madam (said I un|to her and laughed) I came not hither to that end; for in my opinion it concerns your honour to talk, to the end the wo|ld may know that you use not to talk like Page 94 unto Damophile: And indeed, after this I intruded into the company of Damophile and those she talked unto; addressing my speech alwayes unto Sapho, as angry as she was.

In the mean time, there was one man amongst those that were with Damophile, who indeed spoke very well, and began to talke of harmony, and of the nature of Love very eloquently. But Madam it was admirable to see the difference bet|ween Sapho and Damophile, for the last of these never left interrupting him who spoke, and making impertinent objections, which she understood not her selfe, nor could any else make any sense of them. As for Sapho, shee never spake but when a question did absolutely require an answer from her: And though she al|wayes said she understood not the thing in discourse, yet she spoke as one who understood better than some that would undertake to teach: And for all her mo|desty and vexation, and maugre the simplicity of her expressions, it was apparant she understood all things, and that Damophile understood nothing. The last of these, in speaking much, said little; and the other in speaking almost nothing, yet spoke enough to make her selfe admired. At last the Musique begun; and as soon as it was ended, Sapho did rise up in all hast; and pretending some earnest busi|ness, she removed from Damophile, who n|ot being willing to let her goe before she had given her some other fresh disgust, she told her, that doubtlesse her busi|nesse was to finish a Song which was yet in her Chamber unperfected: Sapho understood very well what Damophile said, but she would not trouble her self so far as to answer. On the contrary, she took me by the hand, and went on the other side of the room where Amithone, Erinne, and Cydnor were placed.

They were no sooner met, but she pressed them very earnestly to be gone, and indeed forced them to go sooner than otherwise they would: I pray Madam (said Cydnor, seeing her blush and all in disorder) what accident hath hapned which make you desire to be gone so hastily? When we are all in my Chamber (said she) I will tell you; for I must have a little time to recollect my selfe, after my adventure: however (said Amithone unto me) I pray tell us what hath hapned unto Sapho, for you were with her? For my part (said Athyes, and gave me no time to answer) I cannot devise what it should be: Perhaps replied Erinne, that Democides doth know no more then you do. Pardon me, replied I, for I do know, but I will not know, unless the faire Sapho be pleased to give me leave to impart it. I would not only have Amithone, Erinne, and Cydnor know it (replied she) but I would have all the world also know (if it were possible) how I do hate Damophile and all her friends, and how sorry I am to finde so many fools in the world.

Sapho expressed her selfe in such a pretty chife, that she made me laugh: and as we were thus discoursing, Alces (who I told you was a man who passed for a good witt in Mytelene, and who was so) came unto us with another man of good note named Nicanor: And they came to Sapho's gate, where also we met a Lady called Philire who entred also. As soon as we were entred into the Chamber, and set, all the Ladies asked me what the matter was: when Sapho heard this question asked me, she turned towards them: No no (said she, it is not Democedes which can tell you what I vex at: For there is none who knows it but my selfe: I beseech you tell us then, said Nicanor, who was a well-accomplished man, and who had none of those faults which most young men of his quality use to have. The thing you aske (replied Sapho) is not so easie to be told as you imagine: But since I must tell you, it is that I am so weary of being thought a wit, and of passing for a Schollar, as I begin to make it my chief felicity neither to read, nor write, nor speak; and if it were a thing possible to forget them, I protest I would begin this very hour to be dumb, and would forget to read and write, and speak as long as I lived: So weary am I of the foolishnesse in people, and of the persecution which inseparately is upon such as have a reputation of more wit or knowledge, then how to curl their haire, and make choise of their Ribbands.

Sapho spoke this in such a lovely fret, and with such a sprightly aire, that her handsome anger did cause more love, more liking, and more amity in the soules of all her Auditors But I beseech you (said Cydnor) tell us a little more precisely what's the cause of all this? How is it possible (replied she) that you should see Page 95 me sit so long, so neer Damophile and her pack of quarter witted persons, and not pitty me, and think that I spent my time very ill? had you been of the same side where I was (replied Phylire, and laughed) you would not have been troubled with any over wise Ladies: I assure you (replied she) I know not where I should be; for I saw about you four or five women, who making an open profession of halting every one that has any wit, and who affect such dull gross kind of ignorance, as hath vexed and wearied me, but had you been, where I was (said Nicanor) you had found better entertainment, and more complacency; for there were none but such men about me as would have highly commended you, happily they might (replied shee) but perhaps not after my mode; for Nicanor, most men of your quality do so little know how to speak unto such a one as I am, that they do anger me when they think to oblige me: And except these who are present with me, I know very few who have spoken any thing which hath pleased me, and yet there are some here also who have sometimes vexed me; at least I have reason to complain that they will not acquaint every one, how I desire to be treated. As for Alces (added she) I am sure he knows my mind better than all the rest of the company. 'Tis true, (said he and laughed) that this profession of wit is very troublesome.

How can it be troublesome (replied Phylire?) and what hurt can that reputation which Sapho hath over all the world, do unto her? has she not great reason to rejoice, that all the wits of Athens, Corinth, Lacedemon, Thebes, Argos, Delphos, and in all Greece, should talk of her with admiration? As for such men as know me not (replied Sapho) I am contented they may talk as they please; but I am very ill satisfied with most of those who daily see me, and if you please, I will make all my complaints unto you, to the end Nicanor may instruct the Court how they ought to behave themselves towards wits, and to the end Phylire may acquaint the Ladies of her neighbour-hood how to live with those of ours, and also to the end that Amithone, Erinne, Athys, and Cydnor may not accuse me of being fantastical in my complaints.

Therefore to speak unto the point in generall, I must tell you once more, that there is nothing more troublesome than to have a good wit, and to be treated accordingly; if one have any birth, and nobleness of heart: For this is an infallible Maxime, that when one gets an applause from the multitudes by the flashes of that wit, or any reputation above another by writing verses or prose, they do lose half of their nobleness, and are not like any of their family or kin if they meddle with writing any books, and indeed they will be treated after another manner, than those are, who never meddle with any writing; and it will be said, that such were destined only to please others and are obliged by a Law to be still writing peace after peace; and if they leave writing, they will be no longer regarded: If they be rich, it will hardly be believed, and if they be not, it is the worst of fortune, a poor man who is not guilty of any wit, is better used, than if he were. Yet I see (replied Nicanor) that all the Court doth very much cherish those who are addicted to writing.

I do assure you (replied Sapho) that they are cherished after a very strange manner, for almost all young gallants use to treat those, who are addicted to writing, as they use to treat their Taylors and shoemakers. Indeed they think that they have rendered all that is due to their merit when they have cursorially commended them: For my part; they cannot do me a greater displeasure, than to talk impertinently of those verses which I writ only to please my self. I cannot endure that one should come unto me, and desire me to make an Elogy for him, another a song, and a third come and ask me whither such an Epigram was mine; I cannot endure that they should not speak unto me, as they do unto others, since I desire to be as others are, and cannot be distinguished after so odd a manner: They do not speak unto me as they use unto others if they would make an excuse for not seeing me, they tell me it was because they were afraid to interrupt my study, if at any time they accuse me of being too reserved, they tell me that I am never well but when I am by my self, if I say my head akes, they tell me it is the disease of all good wits: Nay my Physitian when I complain of any little pain, he must be telling me also that the same temper which causeth my good wit, causeth my disease. The truth is, Verses, Wit, Page 96 and Knowledge, are such troubles unto me, that I begin to look upon Ignorance, and stupidity as the only happinesse.

The truth is, replied Alces, the fair Sapho hath great reason for her complaints: and were it not for the satisfaction which her writing does give unto her self, she had never used her pen, though never so learnedly, for my part I have seen many Courts in the world and I have observed most horrible Injustice done unto all writers, Every Grandee desires to be commended but they receive the incense which is offered, unto them as a tribute due, without any regard unto the hand which offered: For my particular I once presented a poem unto a Prince, who took it and liked it, but never did so much as ask to see me; yet to tell you truly, Considering how he used me, I took heart and loved the Author, better than I did the Prince: And my mind better satisfied in having a heart more genuine than his, then if fortune had set me as much above him as he was above me. Oh! my dear Alces (replied Sapho) how infinitely do you joy me? for nothing gives me greater satisfaction than that I am able to tell my self, my soul is more noble than those, whom giddy fortune has set above me. But for all this I cannot choose but oftentimes be very sensible of those disgusts which my reputation of wit doth cause unto me, for I observe both men and women when they talk unto me are much perplexed because they have a fancy, that they must not speak unto me as they do unto others, and they are so perswaded, that I constrain my self in speaking unto them, that they constrain themselves also to go beyond their last, insomuch as I wish that I could Un-Sapho my self; and if my heart could be seen, it would manifest, that nothing could more vex me than to take me for a witty and understanding woman. And therefore I conjure all the company, to ease me of this persecution, by publishing to all the world, that I am not as I am taken to be, but that it is Alces who composed those verses which pass under my name, and that I have nothing in me which is worthy of esteem; to the end all sorts may let me alone in quietness, without either seeking for me, or shunning me: For I must confess, I would neither be courted, or shunned as a woman of wit.

As soon as she had said so, much company came in, who caused the discourse to change; but as for Sapho, she spoke very little all that day (as my sister told me) for I went out as the company increased, because I heard of the arrivall of two of my old friends, who had been long abroad in Travels. But, Madam, since one of them whose name is Phaon, hath a great share in the History which I am relating, It is requisite I speak of him a little more particularly then of the other who was called Thimistogenes, yet I must acquaint you that they were both of them Lesbians, that were practised in one exercise together, and that during our first years I did equally love them, & yet at their return me-thought I had lost the one, though I saw them both: And to explain this Riddle, be pleased to know that when Phaon and Thimistogenes departed I loved the last of these a little better then the first, because indeed he was then more amiable both in his humour and in his Person: But at their return I found a very great alteration, for the one was grown very ill-favoured, and the other much more handsome; the wit of Thimistogenes was not at all improved, but Phaon was so mended, that I assure you he much excelled him, and few men could be found more amiable then he: As for his Person, doubtless it was incomparable, for he was extraordinary fair, but such a fairness as does not resemble the beauty of Ladies, though he had all the good deportments of his own Sex, and all the beauty of others, his stature was tall and noble though not of the highest pitch, his hair very brown, his eyes black and lovely, his cheeks plump, his Teeth white, his Nose even proportioned, and his Aire haughty; moreover for a man, he had most fair hands, a sprightly look, a promising Physiognomy, and I know not what kind of passionateness in his aspect without any affection which spoke him very apt to become a most compleat Gallant. Indeed, Madam, Phaon is so fair and every way so handsome, that the people of Lesbos invented the oddest Fable of him in the world: For he being the Son of a man in great reputation at Mytilene who had commanded Navies in severall Wars: The dull people say, that when he was very young and playing in a little Boat neer one of his Fathers Page 97 Ships Venus came to him, and desired him to carry a message for her in that Boat unto a certain Island: And in recompence of his Service she made him so fair as he was. Thus without any other ground for this Fable (unless because Phaon contrary to custom of men was not so fair when he was a Child as since he became a man) all the people of Lesbos do believe this Fable, as really as if it were a very truth. But, Madam as Phaon is amiable in his Person, so is he also in his humour and spirit, for he is very civil sweet and affable, and without too much mirth, or too much melancholy, he is all that is imaginable to please: besides this, his Aire is naturall easie and agreeable, he speaks well, and home to the purpose: moreover he had a naturall inclination of Gallantry, and there was such a sutableness between his Person, his Humour, and his Wit, as one would say, they were made for one another. As for Thimistogenes he did not at all resemble him, not that he was very ill favoured, but because he did not please, and because his Aire was forced and constrained: Nor was it that he is without any wit at all, but because that wit he has is wrong biassed, and he was very seldom in the right, but is so accustomed to be in the wrong, that one may be almost assured to choose well if they only take that which he chooseth not; And he is very much addicted to love all excellencies, and to Court accomplished men, though it is beyond his reach to know them.

These two men whom I have described had long travelled together without any great affection, or without much Society together: for as soon as they came into any Town their inclinations parted them, and that which pleased the one did never please the other. Thus they were together upon the high-ways, but never in any other place: According to this their custom, as soon as they arrived at Mytilene, they severed, so as I also sought them severally, but could not find them; for as I sought them they were seeing others, insomuch that it was the next morning before I saw them: But as soon as I found the difference between Thimistogenes and Phaon, I changed also as they had done, for I loved Phaon better then I did Thimistogenes: However, since I was not the first whom they had met with in Mytilene I found them already informed of the great beauty in Sapho, yet not by men who knew how to commend her according to her Merit: For they had only told them that she was a great Wit, and understanding Person, and one that had a most admirable faculty in composing Verses. But the wonder was, that though the same Character was given unto them both, yet it produced severall effects, for Thimistogenes out of the curiosity to see all Excellences, was extremely impatient of seeing Sapho. And Phaon on the contrary who had seen Damophile the night before as she came from the Musick house had no desire at all to be acquainted with Sapho, and indeed he was so far from desiring it, when I spake unto him and offered to carry him thither, that he refused the Visite, in lieu of desiring it.

But Themistogenes was so eager, that he was extremely importunate with me to carry him unto Sapho, though I would not, because I found him unworthy of her acquaintance: And I was as importunate with Phaon to see her, though he would not, out of a conceit he had that it was a thing almost impossible for a woman to be learned and not ridiculous, or at least not troublesome: Also the little experience with Phaon had in matters of Love, had suffered an error to grow in his mind (which was quickly rooted out,) That it was better to be in love with a faire foole than a woman of a great wit: So as one day when I had pressed him to goe and see Sapho, and he obstinately had refused, I was very angry with him for not giving credit unto what I told him; For (said I unto him) what reason can you give me, why you will not see Sapho? First, (said he unto me) they say that Damophile is a Coope of Sapho. Secondly, I profess, that if she be, it is impossible the Original should ever please me, for I have found Damophile such a ridiculous piece of folly, that I would run from Country to Country rather than meet with her whom she resembles. Oh most unjust friend, (said I unto him) did you but know what wrong you have done unto the most admirable Sapho you would abhor your injustice, and repent of the injury done unto me in accusing me of ignorance in true merit: I accuse you not (said he unto me) but friend you know every one has a severall gust, and a severall fancy: and for my part I desire only the sight of such Ladies as will divert me, and not teach me, for I am most terribly afraid of such as swell themselves into big words, for small matters; such as are alwayes Page 98 upon the top of Parnassus, and never talk unto men, but in the language of gods: And if you will needs have me discover the secret of my soule unto you, I must confess, that in Sicily I was in love with a faire foole; and I will not run the hazard of being in love with a faire wit, who perhaps will make me despaire. Therefore I conjure you to trouble me no more; For if Sapho be such a one as I do imagine her, she will make me most horribly hate her: And if she be such a one as you say she is, perhaps I shall love her too well to keep my self in quietnesse. But is it possible (said I unto him) that you could fall in love with a foole? The truth is (replied he and laughed) I was not in love with a foole but I must confesse, that there was such a faire foole whom I did not hate.

I perceive then (said I unto him) that one may love beauty wheresoever it is, though in a fair woman without any wit, but I cannot imagine one should love her person be she never so faire: Also I perceive you do not know all the delicate delights of rough passion, since you never loved any but a faire foole: I know not whether I knew all the delights, replied Phaon) but I am sure that I know all the torments: Alas my deare friend, (said I unto him) you are but a Novice in love, for none are ever happy in it, unless they be first miserable. Those doe not deserve the sweet which will not taste the bitter; a thing must be desired with inquietude before it can be enjoyed with delight: and before one can know all the sweets of love he must love a woman that hath wit. For my part (continued I) I love a faire Picture which cannot talk foolishly, better then a faire woman, who tattles and commits a thousand impertinencies. As we were thus talking, Themistogenes came in, whose mind being opposite unto Phaons, he entreated me to carry him unto Sapho, telling me he had a very earnest desire to see her: and adding, that in all likely-hood he should fall in love with her, if he found her such a beauty as he imagined. If so sir (said I purposely to prevent him) I must not carry you thither, for you would be extremely miserable if you should become a lover of a person, who has so many others. Thus I not being able to perswade Phaon, and Themistogenes not being able to perswade me, we parted, but I wondred when after dinner being at Saphoes, shee should tell me that Nicanor and Phyllire who had seen Phaon, did give him such a noble Character, as though it was not her use to affect fresh acquaintance yet she could not choose but desire his. The very truth is Madam, (replied I) Phaon is a person, of very extraordinary merit, since he is your intimate friend (replied she) I shall hope he will come and visit Cydnon, and so happily I shall see him at her Chamber.

I believe Madam, (replied I) that he would see you at your own house before any other place, did he not stand in feare of you: Alas Democedes (said shee unto me) why should any friend of yours stand in feare of me; but to be plaine with you, I shall think you have infused a bad opinion of me into him, if he do not come and see me, you may imagine Madam how this expression of Saphoes perplexed me, knowing the mind of Phaon as I did; but I engaged my self to bring him unto Sapho, and accordingly I went very seriously unto Phaon, and desired him to make this visite for my sake, if not for Saphos; but I had much ado to perswade him, yet being affraid to fall out with me, he yielded: but told me withall, that I must take this Complacency as a great argument of his friend-ship, and afterwards promised me to go the next day with me unto Sapho: But that which most troubled me was, that I durst not carry him unless I carry Themistogenes also, because he would be very angry with me if I had not; so that to carry a very pleasing man unto her, I was constrained to carry a very ill Companion also. I advertised Sapho of this intended visite, and she acquainted all her dear friends with it, so that Amithone, Erinne, Athys, and Cydnon were all with her, when Phaon, Themistogenes and I came thither, Sapho being one of the most pleasing Persons in the world at the first sight, and the most obliging when she pleased; she received us extremely kindly, and in such a gallant manner, that I saw very well Phaon was much surprised, and that he did not expect to find her Aire so free, so amiable, and so naturall.

As for Themistogenes, I observed that he was astonished as well as Phaon, but it was in a different manner, yet being both of them prepossessed with an opinion of Saphos knowledge, and conceiving they ought to speak in an Elevated stile, they begun their discourse in a grave, serious, and very solemn Tone. And though Page 99 I told Phaon there needed no such setting off himself in Print, yet he did not beleive me; so that thinking he ought to commend her as a Person extraordinary, and in the highest Phrases, he began his Encomium with a very eloquent Exordium. But Sapho stopping his Oration, and turning towards me, I professe Democides (said she) I have great reason to complaine against you: Against me Madam (replied I with astonishment) Yes (replied she) against you; for since Phaon does not know me, it were injustice to complain against him: and therefore I do positively accuse you for all these applaude which he bestows upon me; for had you acquainted him that I do not affect any Commendations, I believe him to be a more accomplished man then to turn his Complacency into, such flatteries as cannot chuse but displease me. I assure you Madam, replied I, I advised him not to offend the modesty of your humour: Then 'tis apparent hee does not know me (replied Sapho) But Phaon (continued she and turned towards him) since I do not love to be beholding unto Fame, I shall take it as a very singular favour if you would judge of mee onely by your own knowledge: Let time and experience give you the knowledge of me: For it would be very unjust in you to judge of me upon the reports of others. Madam (replied Phaon, and smiled) I do admire your Modesty, and that's all I dare say; for to acknowledge that you merit more commendations then Fame doth give you, is to tell you that you merit more then ever any did. Can fame give you better report (added Themistogenes, thinking to hit the naile upon the head) then that a Lady can make better verses then ever Homer did? and that she is wiser then all the seven Sages of Greece? However Sir (said Sapho) I cannot endure that any should tell me of any such things; and the greatest injury my friends can do me, is to think that I love to be commended: For since I know that I am not wise, I cannot endure to be told that I am: and though I were so, yet surely I should hate flattery: I cannot deny but that I have made some foolish verses; but Poetry being only an effect of a natural inclination, as musique is, I ought to be no more commended for making verses, then for singing.

After this, Sapho turning the discourse upon some other subject very ingeniously, she was extremely carefull to talk of nothing that might smell of too much wisdom: but on the contrary, she passed away all the afternoon in a pleasant Rallly with her friends, twitting them with a thousand petty passages concerning their Caballa, which yet were so intelligible, that Phaon and Themistogenes did take as much delight in them as those did who were acquainted with the passages.

Afterwards Alces and Nicanor coming in, Sapho began to chide the first of them for a custome which he had, and which he always used when occasion presented it selfe. For Madam, be pleased to know, that Alces had such a fancy of a faire woman, that he could not endure those who were not so, and he would alwayes be sure to change place whensoever Chance had set him neere any ill-favoured person: So it hapned, when he was in Sapho's Chamber, that a Woman came in, who indeed was very ugly; he according to his humour went out, and went so abruptly, that the woman plainly saw, that he went out purposely to shun her. Sapho being desirous to turn discourse another way, began after a gallant manner, to condemn his nicenesse, and in his person to blame most young Gallants of the time whose Custome was to do the like: Truly Madam (said Alces unto her) I had not gone out at that time from your Chamber, but because I desired to go unto the faire Athys, and I do protest not upon any other reason: I pray Alces, replied Athys, make not your visit unto me your excuse, for you came not to me that day: Then I went unto Amithones (added he) no replied that faire one, for both Erinne, Cydnon, and my selfe did see you out of the window of my Chamber walking about two hours with a friend of yours, who is one of the ugliest men that ever any eye beheld, and who questionlesse is more ugly then the Lady who you shunned. I professe it is very strange (replied Sapho) you should have such irregular thoughts: and I would gladly know why you should more tolerate an ugly man than an ugly Woman: and why you should shun an ugly Woman as much as you would the Plague: This is an injury unto our Sexe, and as if Women were made for no other use then Colours are, to please the eye. This Alces, is most unjust; for if you love that only which is faire, and hate that which is foul, why have you not faire friends, as well as faire Mistresses? Page 100 and why are you not as carefull to shun ugly Men as ugly Women? Women as well as Men that are ill favoured, may have a thousand charms of wit, and a thousand beauties of soule, and therefore why more hated? Yet I see most young Gallants are guilty of this injustice: yes there are some men who are extremely ugly themselves, yet cannot endure a Woman so: They desire the fairest eyes should look favourably upon them, and yet they will look upon none but faire Women with the ugliest eyes under the Sun. I know one who looks upon him selfe in a glasse, as if he were the handsomest of all men living: and though he can look upon his own deformities with delight, yet he cannot with any patience endure the deformities of others: You expresse your thoughts Madam so excellently, replied Phaon, that I believe Alces with all his wit will have much ado to answer you. I assure you (replied Alces) that I had rather acknowledge a fault in me, then go about to justifie my selfe, since I cannot do it, unless I should speak many things against Ladies in generall. You expresse your selfe with so much malignity (replied Amithone) that you deserve (as a punishment for shunning such women as are not faire) all faire ones should avoid meeting with you.

Provided one faire one will not fly me (replied he, looking upon Athys) I should not much grieve if all the rest did. Though I were faire (replied Erinne) yet I should be none of those who would give any comfort unto you: And since <> am not (added Athys, and blushed) I have nothing to do but to comfort my selfe that I am not in the number of those who can comfort Alces: For hee is so nice, that he cannot endure those (who like me) are neither faire nor ugly. This is so unjust (replied Alces) as I wonder that the faire Sapho who useth to be just unto merit, can endure it. The reason is, replied she, because it belongs not unto me to commend the beauty of Athys in your presence: For since you have such tender and delicate eyes as cannot look upon any ugliness in women, I am perswaded they are also judicious enough to know true beauty, and that you can commend her better then any other. However (continued she) I would gladly know, whether Phaon and Themistogenes be as nice as Alces is: As for Nicanor and Democides, I know they have some friends who are none of the fairest. For my part Madam (replied Phaon) though I am a great adorer of beauty, yet I should think it a great wrong unto Ladies, if I should look upon it as the only advantage of their sexe: And I can assure you, I am so far from the opinion of Alces, that I am perswaded it is not a thing impossible to be in love with a woman who hath no beauty at all, provided she be not extremely ugly: For there are women who have such rare beauties of mind, and such engaging graces in their humours, that they may infinitely please, and be very amiable. For my part (said Themistogenes) I should much better love a woman who is knowing in all high and excellent things, though she were not handsome, then I should an ignorant faire one. For ought I see (replied Sapho and laughed) I can never be loved either by Alces, or by Themistogenes: For I am not faire as the first would have his Mistresse, nor am I knowing, as Themistogenes desires his to be: and therefore it is my best course to make Nicanor, Phaon, and Democedes my friends: But if in seeking to make them your friends (replied Cydnon, and smiled) you should finde a Lover of any of them, what would you say then? Doubtlesse I should say, replied she, that I have found more then ever I did, or more then I do desire.

As Nicanor, Phaon, and I were ready to reply, Cyngira entred into her Chamber, whose presence made our discourse to change, and Nicanor, Phaon, Themistogenes and I went presently out. Yet Madam, since there was a very pleasant Plain before Sapho's Lodging, we walked there: And after one turn, Phaon began to speak in a low voice unto me, because he would not have Nicanor know his opinion of Sapho. Ah dear friend (said hee unto mee) what an Enemy had I been unto my selfe, had I not seen the most admired Sapho? Well (said I unto him) have you found her over-wise? does she much resemble Damophile? was there any necessity of talking concerning high matters as you imagined you should? For my part (said he) I am so charmed with the sight of her, that I cannot think any one in the world comparably so amiable: For she is so sweet, so solciable, and so gallant, as I find her all superlative; and when I consider how this excellent Woman who is versed in the most sublime knowledge, did divert her Page_101 selfe so pleasingly in triviall things, I begin to feare I shall fall in Love with her, if I should continue seeing her: and yet I think it is impossible for me to forbear. I thought you would change your opinion of her (said I unto him) as soon as you saw her: But I would gladly know (said he) whether she be alwayes so amiable as she was this day; and whether she have no tincture of that pride, which is almost inseparable from such as have any extraordinary parts? Tell me friend, does she always speak with so little affectation or sharpnesse as she did now?

All I can say unto you is, replied I, that she is sometimes as much above what you saw her now, as you found her now above what you expected: Oh Democedes, replied he, it is not possible: The faire Sapho cannot, no it is most impossible she should appear more amiable than she did this day.

After this, Nicanor began to talk with Phaon, and Themistogenes began to ad|resse his speech unto me very faintly: I must confesse unto you (said he unto me) I have been much astonished this afternoon: Why (said I) are you not pleased with the sight of Sapho? So little, replied he, that were I not perswaded she concealed her knowledge because there was many Women in the company, I should lay aside the high opinion which I had conceived of her: For truly I heard her not speak any thing this day which any other Lady did not know as well as she, & might speak as well. Yet you must confesse (replied I coldly) that though she did speak like a Lady, yet it was like a Lady who spoke very well.

I must needs confesse, said he, that she used no barbarous words; but to tell you truly, I expected much more from her then I found: Perhaps you expected (said I unto him) that she should have read a Philosophy Lecture, resolved some difficult questions, and explained some obscure places in Hesiod and Homer? I expected at least (said he) that nothing would have come out of her mouth but high matter, w|ch should have made her knowledge appeare: And for my part, I tell you ingenuously, that I am perswaded she will sometimes shew her know|ledge, for it is not possible she should get such a reputation over all Greece, if she talked of nothing but trifles, such as I heard her speak of this day.

You may imagin Madam, how I wondred at the difference of opinion between Phaon and Themistogenes. In the mean time, Themistogenes spoke so loud, that Phaon confusedly heard what he said, so that being now one of the most jealous admirers of Sapho, he came unto us, and asked me of what Themistogenes talked? He told me (replied I and smiled) that he could not see how Sapho should de|serve all those applauses which are attributed unto her; but that he expected from her, a thousand excellencies, which she never so much as mentioned. I perceive, (replied Phaon faintly) that the fair Sapho cannot get the esteem both of Themistogenes and me, for I do infinitely esteem her. After her discourse upon all these trifles, where with he upbraids her; but I should scarcely have esteemed her, had she only talked of such high matters as he imagined she would; so that it follows of absolute necessity, she cannot please us both: I confess it (replied Themisto|genes faintly) but the difficulty is to know whether it were not more advantage|ous for Sapho, to satisfie me than to satisfie you. If you please to let Nicanor and Democedes be our Judges, replied Phaon, I shall consent unto it.

Since I am altogether on your side (replied Nicanor unto Phaon) and directly against Themistogenes, I am not a competent judge: it is no wonder, said Phaon, that Themistogenes and I should differ in Opinions, for it is not above two years since, we were both of one mind, in any thing: so as it is not strange that as soon as I began to admire Sapho he should not admire her; but prefer Damophile because I preffr Sapho before all the women I ever saw: and indeed I have abun|dance of reason so to do, for to write as she writes, and to discourse as she doth, are two qualities so admirable, that she deserves the esteem of the world. But yet I pray tell mee (replied Themistogenes in such a pelt as made us laugh) what hath she said which hath excellency in it? she spoke elegantly and gallantly (replied Phaon) and she spoke with modesty, and in such a discreet manner, as she hath merited my admiration; but not mine (replied he) for I never use to ad |...> ny thing but what is extraordinary: I once knew a man at Athens (replied Phaon) who was of the same humour with Themistogenes, for he knew not how to put a difference between things which men admire, and things which make Page_102 men astonished; I cannot tell you whether I am of his humour you mean, or no (replied Themistogenes very |ercely) but I am sure I cannot see any difference between Sapho and other women of Mytelene, by any discourse I heard her utter, and in the humour I am in, if she do not elevate her Muse to a higher strain than I heard her this day, I shall beleive some hath made her verses and published them in her name.

Phaon hearing Themistogenes say so, began first to laugh, and afterwards to be angry in good earnest, so as replying very sharply upon one another: they sell to quarrell: Nicanor and I should have had much ado to part them, if Alces and two more had not accidentally come in.

However, since this quarrell could not be taken up upon the sudden, it was the next day before they were reconciled; so as it was divulged all over the Town. But Phaons advantage was, that I related all the passage unto my sister, and she unto Sapho, in|somuch as the very first day that he saw Sapho, she understood that she was obliged to him.

This reconciliation had one Circumstance in it which was very remarkable; for Phaon would not be |eind> with Themistogenes, untill he had acknowledged him|self too blame in judging so rashly upon Saphoes merit, so as this excellent Lady heal|ring of all these passages did think her self very much beholden unto Phaon, and the next time she saw him, she received him very obligingly, and she no sooner saw him enter into her chamber, but she went to meet him most civilly, and acc|sted him with such singular and gallant complements, that it deserves a rehearsal: For looking upon him with a smiling countenance: Sir, said she unto him, you have so commended me for not talking of high matters, that I care scarcely thank you for the favour least contrary to my custome I should use any such big phrases as might purchase the esteem of Themistogenes, and loose yours.

Your language Madam (replied he) is so full of wit and gallantry that I cannot repent of my disgust against Themistogenes, for he who does not admire you, deserves an immortal quarrell from all rationall men, when you are well acquaint|ed with me Sir, (replied Sapho) you will see that I am not so jealous of my ho|nour: And that as long as they do not asperse my virtue and my goodness, I care not what they say.

Afterwards Sapho, causing Phaon to sit down, the company were very pleasant, for not only all her intimate friends were there, but Phylire, Nicanor, and I were there also, And after much discourse upon the Error of Themistogenes, who thought every one to be ignorant, if they do not talk of high things, Phylire said that though gross ignorance was a most odious fault, yet she thought it better all women were so, then to be overwise, for do but imagin, said she, what a pestilent persecution it would be, if we had but two or three damosells more in Mytelene, But I beseech you imagin also on the other side replied Phaon, what a felicity it would be if there were but five or six Saphoes in the whole world, and if Athens, Delphos, Thebes, and Argos, could boast of that honour as well as Mytelene. Oh Phaon replied Sapho, and blushed) I beseech you do not lessen my Obligations by over|commending me, and remember that I do not affect it, nor would I pass for wise. For the truth is, that though I do know some things, which all women do not know, yet I am sure I know less, than all women ought to know.

Truly Madam, (replied Cydnor and laughed) you do engage them unto a great task, and to speak sincerely, you know so much, that I cannot tell how you should conceal your knowledge from them, nor how you should infuse it into them. I am very certain (replied Sapho) that I know so very little, that if all women, would im|ploy that time well which they im|ploy idely, they would know a thousand times more than I do. Your expressions Madam, are so ingenious, so modest, and so noble, (replied Phaon) that though what you say as relating to your selfe be not positively true, yet I cannot for my life choose but commend you: For it is most certain that most Ladies are much to blame in spending many a most precious houre, which might be much better employed than they use to do.

For my particular (said Phylire) I cannot tell how Ladies can learn any thing though they would; for often times, I have not so much leasure as to go unto the temple, and I have a friend who is every day so long in dressing her self, that the sun is set before she can get out of her Chamber.

Page_103 I have often thought (replied Amithone) that Sapho could not afford her self so much time as to sleep and do all shee did, untill I went a journey with her into the Countrey; But since then, I have been convinced of my error, by seeing her or|der her time so well, that she had leasure to do a thousand things, which I could not do: for she found as much time to sleep as kept her complexion fresh, and her eyes in Luster: she had time enough to dresse her self as gallantly as any did: she had also her times of reading, writing, studying, walking, and still time enough to look unto her businesse, and to enjoy her friends. And all this without being troubled, or being busie. I would she would teach me the secret (said the faire A|this) for could I learn it, I would strive to know more then I do. But before you oblige her to impart so great a secret (replied Erinne) I would all women here would wel exam|ine whetherit be expedient that women generally, should know more then they do. I think that Question will easily be resolved (replied Sapho) for I must confess that though I am a declared enemy unto all women who are alwayes in their Altitudes of knowledge and wisdom, yet I cannot choose but extreame|ly condemne the other extreame, and be ashamed to see so many women of quality so grosely ignorant, as in my opinion, they dishonour their sex. Nor know I any thing more injurious unto our sex, then that any should say a woman is not obliged to learn any thing: for if so, then would I also have her forbidden to speak, and not taught to write: for if she may write and speak, it is but reason she should use all helps to better her understanding, to informe her judgment, and to learne how to speak and write well. And seriously it is the oddest thing in the world to observe how women commonly are educated: They must not be any Gossippers nor Gallants, and yet they are taught with abundance of care every quality that belongs to gallantry, but never any thing that will fortifie their virtue, or im|prove their wits: Dancing, singing, and playing, are parts that must not by any means be neglected, but are never instructed in any thing which may make them speak well, or carry themselves in any business with discretion: And considering how some Ladies lead their lives, one would think, that they were forbidden all reason, or wit, for they doe nothing in the world but sleep, grow fat. and make themselves faire, and never do or say any thing but foolishly. And I am sure there's none in the company but knows some unto whom what I say is applicative: For my part, I do know one who useth continually to sleep above twelve houres: who spends three or foure in dressing her self, or to say better in undressing her self, for she spends half the time, in undoing what she did before, afterwards she employes two or three more in her repasts and collations, and all the rest of the day is spent amongst men unto whom she knowes not how to talke: Judge I be|seech you, whether the life of this Lady is not well spent: I must confesse, replied Alces, many Ladies, do live as you do say.

For my part, replied Cydnor, I am not at all concerned in what she says, for since I spend my whole time in her company, I cannot be charged with any mis|pending it: Oh Cydnor, replied Amithone, I hartly thank you for finding out so good a reason, to make my ignorance excusable, since I have as much right unto it as you (added the faire Athys) I may make the same use of it.

Were I as knowing as you are, (replied Erinne) I should not stand in need of a|ny excuse: For my part, (said Phylire) I have no excuse for my selfe: For I have so seldome the happinesse of seeing Sapho, that I cannot make it my excuse to have employed any of my time in her company. And I must ingeniously con|fesse, that sometimes I trifle away a whole day, and yet cannot say that I had any considerable businesse: For my part (said Sapho,) to speak in generall, the reason why women have so little time, is because they spend it idely, and make a great business of every trifle: one misplaced Curle is an hours rectification, and takes up more time, then a thing both of profit and delight would do, yet I would not have it thought (added she) that I am at all against any womens ornaments or dancing, singing or playing or such accomplishments: no, on the contrary, I allow them all delights and recreations: but to tell you truely, I would have them take as much care in dressing their minds as well as their bodies. And between being knowing and ignorant, I would have them take the middle between these two ex|treams, which will keep them from being troublesome, by their ignorant stupidity Page_104 or impertinent audacity. I assure you, replied Amithone, this way is very hard to be found out. If any living can find it, and teach it, replied Phaon, it must be Sapho. For my particular (replied Phylire) I should be infinitely obliged unto her, if she would be pleased to tell me how far a woman ought to be knowing: Doubtless it is very difficult (replied Sapho) to give a generall rule for what you aske: for there are such variety and difference of spirits that no Law can be so uni|versall, and not unjust.

Yet I conceive this for an infallible Maxime, that though I would have w^olmen to know more then generally they do, yet I would not have them talke as if they were knowing at all I would have them give others leave and cause to say, that they know more then they will vaunt of, that they have good wits, that they can speak well, and write elegantly, but I would not have it said of them, that they are learned: Not but that those who are not called learned may know as much, and perhaps more then those unto whom they give that Title: yet I would have them conceale their knowledge and wits: Then I perceive (said Philire) That there are some things which either they must not know, or else they must not shew them though they do know them. It is most certainly true, (replyed Sapho) that there are some sciences which women ought never to learn, and that there are others which they may, yet they ought never to confesse they know them though they may let people guesse as much. But, I beseech you, unto what purpose is it for them to know such things as they must never be known to know? (replyes Philire) it wil help them to understand what those who are more learned then them selves do say (replyed Sapho) and to speak also to the purpose, without speaking bookishly, but only as if naturall ingenuity instructed them. Also there are a hundred delectable Sciences, which are not necessary to be kept secret, for they may very well speak forraigne Languages, they may confesse that they have read Homer, Hesiod, and the excellent works of the illustrious Aristhius, without any shewing too much Schollership: Also they may give their opinions in so modest a manner without any unbecomningnesse to their sex, as they may thereby make their witt, their knowledge and their judgement to appeare. They may and ought to know, all the helps unto writing well for in my opinion, it is a most grosse error, to say they would have women speak well and write ill, and the priviledge of ignorance which they pretend unto is so shamefull unto all their sex in generall, that if they understood it they would blush. The truth is, said Nicanor. There is so little coherence in the letters of Ladies, and such odd Orthographie, as if they writ them purposely not to be understood, yet those very same Ladies (said Sapho) and laughed, who commit such grosse faults in their writings, and have spent all their stock of wit in the first line, they will mock a whole day together at a poore stranger, who hath only mistaken one word for another, yet it is much more strange to see a witty woman commit a hundred faults in writing her own naturall Language, then to see a Sythian speak all Greek. Alas, (said Philire and laughed) how deeply am I concerned in your discourse? yet you speak so very well (replyed I) as I cannot think it possible but you must write well also. I do beleeve (replyed Sapho) that Philire writes as well as she speaks: but by your leave, there are some women who speak well and write ill, and all merely by their own negligence: I would gladly know how that comes to passe (said the faire Athys) The reason is, (replyed Sapho) because most women do not care for reading, or else they doe not read applicatively, but run on without any reflection upon what they read: So that though they have read the very same words which they write a thousand times over, yet they visite them wrong, and mislocating the letters they patch up confused nonsense by a custome. All this is most true, (replyed Erinne) For yelsterday I made a visit unto one of my friends who is newly returned out of the Countrey, and I caryed all the Letters which she had writ unto me, that she might read them unto me.

Tis plaine therefore, replyed Sapho., that I had good reason to wish women would use to read much, and to read with application: And when they are a lone to make choise of some merry or serious book according to their humour, for it is most certaine that reading doth sooner, and better refine wit, and informe the judgment, then conversation alone can, for truely Conversation doth only give us the Page 105 first thoughts of those who speak, which often are tumultuous, and so undigested that the speakers do condemne them within a quarter of an hour after; But reading gives us the concocted Opinion of those who writ the books we read. So that though they read simply for their delight, yet it will imprint something in the mind of the Reader, which will better it, and preserve them from falling into many grosse errors which ignorance would plung them unto: For my part (said Alces) I know one of those bold Ignorants, who will be talking of every thing though she know nothing, who talking the other day unto a stranger which was relating his Travells, she discovered her ignorance so farre, as it appeared she thought the Caspian Sea greater then the Egean and that the Euxine Sea was beyond the Caspian. And that the Egean Sea was the least of all others. I would advise all w^olmen, replied Sapho, not to talke much of what they know well, and not to talk at all of what they know not.

And indeed, I would have them, never to be very knowing nor very ignorant, but only to manage well those advantages which nature hath given them. I would have them (as I said before) be as carefull to beautifie their minds (as their Per^sons. But I beseech you (said Phylire) how can women find leisure to read and learn any thing? That time which Ladies lose in doing nothing, or in doing things nothing to any purpose (replyed Sapho, would serve to let them know enough, to conceale their ignorance. Moreover, do not imagine, I would have any woman such a perpetuall Reader as never to talk: No, (but on the contrary) I would have her read only so much as will teach her how to speak well. And would advise them to Conversation, as well as to the other, provided they never transgress the mo^destie of their Sex. But I wish with all my heart that women were not such slug^gards as they are, and I wish that I my selfe may apply these Councells unto my self which I give unto others. Madam, replyed Phaon your modesty goes too farr, and you need not say that of your self which none does think. The truth is, said Nicanor, the fair Sapho is very unjust unto her own merit. She is so just unto the merit of others, (replyed Athys) that it were strange she should not be so unto her owne.

Her advantage is (replyed Cydnon) that every one renders her that justice which she denyes her self; And though she conceals her self as much as she can, yet her excellencies are known unto all Greece: You clip the wings of Fame (replyed Phaon and smiled) For I am certaine that the name of Sapho is famous throughout the whole World. For Heavens sake (said the most admirable woman interrupting him and blushing) speak not thus in my presence• for I cannot endure it should be thought I take any delight in such high Applauds, since I am most confidently perswaded (and I speak it with all the sincerity of my heart) that I do not deserve them: if that be true Madam, replyed Athys, it is very strange, that you should be knowing in so many things, and yet be ignorant of your own merit: Seriously (replyed Sapho) in a lovely ch••e) unlesse you do unaccustome your selves from commending me, I shall unaccustome my self from seeing you any more. Oh Madam (cryed Phaon, Nicanor, Alces and I all at once. For Heavens sake do not threaten us with any such sad affliction. But after this, Sapho continuing her dis^course with her accustomed modestie, she told us a hundred pleasing stories, and knew so well how to charm the company that we parted not till night:

At our going from Saphos house, we saw Thimistogenes leading Damophile: and the next day we heard by one of his friends, that he preferred her a thousand de^lgrees before Sapho: So as wondering at his extravagancie we both of us promis^ed to shun him as well as Damophile. In the mean time, I began to perceave, that Phaon in all likelihood would fall in Love with Sapho, if he were not so already. On the otherside, I understood by my Sister that Sapho did infinitely esteeme him, and that he pleased her more then all the men she ever saw. Alces who was Tisanⁱders spie did also perceive this growing love of Phaon, and the inclination of Sapho, for he hinted as much unto the faire Athys with whom he was in Love: Nicanor who was one of Saphoes adorners, had some slight suspicion of it. And both Amil^thone and Erinne did perceive it as the rest did. As for Sapho, she knew that Phaon was in love with her before he ever told her; for she had such a suitable and delicate spirit of discernment into every thing, that she perfectly knew what thoughts Page 106 every one had of her, and sometimes knew them before they knew them^selves: As fervent as the friendship was which any bore unto this charming Lady, she would never take it under any notion of Love: And how faint and cold soever this passion was in the hearts of some men who were not capable of any zealous fires, by reason of their frozen tempers, she would never take them under the no^tion of Friendship: so that it is most certain, she precisely knew in what degree aⁿy one loved her: and it was so impossible to conceale it from her, that it was ab^solure folly to attempt it; for she could so well distinguish between the lookes of friendship and the looks of Love, that she was never mistaken.

Moreover she did not only know of what natures the affection of any was unto her: but also she knew what thoughts every one who used to visit her, had unto one another: So as this discerning knowledg of all hearts enabled her to manage matters so cunningly, that she made all Rivalls live in peace, and she augmen^ted or lessened the affection which any bore unto her, almost as she pleased. And yet this last quality had more difficulty in it then the other, for she is so very love^lly, that it is a very hard matter for any Lover to go lesse: yet still she would so temper them, as that they would tell her no more then what she had a mind to heare.

Sapho having such a discerning eye, she quickly saw that Phaon was in Love with her: and the sight of it did not offend her, but found such a sweet relish of it in her heart, as she plainly saw, that if she would ever defend her selfe against Phaon, shee must begin betimes, so as shee resolved to overcome her selfe: But she could not resolve to hinder Phaon from ioving her, and contented her selfe with never answering his affection by the like. However, Cydnon being her grand Confident, they held a Councell together about it, which I intend to relate unto you, that you may the better know the temper of Sapho's soule.

My sister being then with her one Evening, and both leaning upon a Balcone which opened towards the Sea, she saw by Moon light some ships coming to My^t•elene. I wish these be not the Ships of Thrasibulus, which bring back Tysander unto us (said she, and smiled): For that Prince being of very much merit, I wish for his own tranquility he may not return unto a Place where he would be more miserable then when he departed: I cannot see (replyed Sapho) that any great alterations have hapned here since his departure: For I hold him in the same de^lgree of esteem as I did, and my heart has the same resolutions of never loving him: if that were all, replyed Cydnon, he would not be so miserable as he is like to be; but I know there is something more in it, I wonder (replyed Sapho) why you should say so. Since you would needs have it (replyed Cydnon) I must tell you, that Phaon is here: Cydnon you are always so full of your Querks (replyed Sapho and blushed) that I need not wonder at them. I assure you Madam, replyed Cydⁿon, there is no Quarks in what I say; for it is so apparant Phaon is in Love with you, as it is impossible to be one hour in his company, and not perceive it: And when he is in your presence, they must be blind who do not see it, and deaf who cannot understand it by his words; for he speaks always with such cordiall earⁿestnesse, that his thoughts cannot be doubted: However, replyed Sapho, they do not see mee answer him with the same earnestnesse. You Madam (replyed Cydnon) doe know so well how to regulate all your actions, that your thoughts can never bee knowne by your Actions: Yet I who know you better then any others, I am most confident you do not hate Phaon, and that if Fate have resolved you must love any, it must be him: I perceive Cydnon (replyed shee and smiled) that you think you have stoin from mee the Art of knowing the thoughts of others by bare conjectures: but I believe that you are now mistaken in your Conjectures and Predictions: 'Tis true (added she) That Phaon was very glad to find that I did resemble Damophile: and (to be sincere with you) I know he loves me, or at least hath some inclination to it: But I must professe unto you, that I have no intentions to answer his Love. For since exact decency requires one should not only defend themselves against criminal affections, but from the most innocent also, I must observe it, and not expose my selfe unto scandall, al^though I am perswaded that it is not impossible but one may love very innocent^lly. I do believe it is not impossible (replyed Cydnon): And since there are many Page 107 men have honest hearts, there can be no great danger in engaging with them. It is so dangerous (said Sapho) that since I knew the world, I never knew two whom I could think capable of any compliance of such a nature as I imagine.

But to speak unto you as unto my second selfe, though decency hath so esta^blished it a Law, that Women should not love any by reason of the bad conse^lquences which Love may cause when it is in bad minds and hearts, which have only grosse, brutall, and terrestriall thoughts: yet let me positively tell you, that it is unjust, and without derogation from solid virtue. I believe one may make some distinction between some men, and contract a pure affection with one whom one shall make choise of.

And indeed, the Gods who never made any thing in vaine, did not create in vaine a certain inclination in our souls to love: But Cydnon, the grand difficulty is to regulate this affection, to make a good choise of him whom one would love, and to carry it so discreetly, that scandall it selfe cannot cavill at it: And when all is done, it is most certain that nothing is comparably so sweet as to be loved by a person whom one doth love. Doubt not but that I do condemn all the irregu^llar extravagancies of Love, but I do not condemn the passion it selfe which cau^sed it: And the truth is, those extravagancies proceed rather from the distempers of those who are in Love, then from Love it selfe: and it must be confessed, that they who do not know, that I know not what which redoubles all delights, and has the art of giving sweetnesse unto inquietude, they do not know how far joys can reach. As for those Ladies who take delight in being loved without loving a^lgain, they have no other satisfaction then what their own vanities affords them: But I do comprehend that there are a thousand sweers which are all purity and all innocency in a mutuall affection. This agreeable exchange of thoughts, of secret thoughts, this communion of souls which is made between two persons who love each other, is a pleasure unutterable, unconceivable. And to judge of Love by Friendship, I assure you my deare Cydnon, that I am now more joyed in opening my heart unto you, then I should be if we were together at the most glorious Feast in the world.

Then Madam, to tast these joyes more fully (replied Cydnon) I conjure you to open your most secret thoughts unto me, and confesse unto me sincerely, that if you find in Phaon all that is desirable to contract such an affection with him as you imagine, that you would have much ado to defend your selfe: And to carry this condition as far as it will go, tell me truly the nature of this affection, and in what manner you imagine it. Ah Cydnon (said she unto her) you engage me very far: Yet since I will not deny you any thing. I will answer to your question, and tell you that I am not of their minds who speak of Love, as of a thing which cannot be innocent, unlesse they intend to marry: For my part, I must confesse unto you that the delicacy of my mind, of my fancy, and of that Idea which I conceive of this passion is such, that I do not think that kind of Matrimoniall Love to be pure and noble enough; And if I found in my heart only a bare desire of marrying any one, I should blush as for a crime, upbraid my selfe as with a thing unworthy of my selfe, and should be more ashamed then other women use to be of a criminal gallantry.

But I beseech you Madam (replied Cydnon) would you have any love you without any hopes? I would have him hope to be loved (replied she) but I would not have him hope any further; and it is the greatest folly in the world to love any one unlesse with intention to love for ever: but to love any other way then as I intend, is to expresse ones selfe to fall from Love unto indifferency, from indifferency to hatred, and from hatred to scorn.

But I beseech you tell me (replied Cydnon) how you intend one should love you, and how you do intend to love? I expect (said she) that one should love me servently, that he should love none but me, and love me with all imaginable respect: I would have his love so tender and sensible, as to think the least triffe from me a delight, I would have his love to have the solidity of friendship, and founded upon esteem and upon inclination. Moreover, I would have this Lover to be most faithfull and sincere: yet would I have him to admit of no confidence of his passion but my selfe, but so lock up his Love in his heart, that I may Page_108 brag of being the only one who knows it: I would have him also tell me all his secrets, impart all his sorrows unto me: I would have the sight of me to be his chief felicity, and that my absence may be a most sad affliction to him: That hee never mention the least syllable to me, which may make me suspect his love, and that he fully perswade me that it is fervent and eternally durable: In short, my deare Cydnon, I would have a Lover, and not a Husband: I would have him such a one as contenting himselfe with the possession of my heart, should love me till death and if I cannot find out such a one, I will never have any. Well Madam (replied Cydnon) since you have told me how you would be loved, so I beseech you tell me how you do intend to love. In telling the one, replied she, I have told you the other: and there ought to be no other difference of thoughts, then such as custome hath established, which requires that the man must be more complaisant, more obsequious and more submissive: As for matter of tenderness and confidence, doubtles they ought to be both equall: and if any difference be to be made, it is in this, that the man ought to give testimonies of his love, and the woman to let him only guess at hers.

If Phaon be ever so happy (replied Cydnon) as to give you any test monies of his love, and that you permit him to guess at yours, doubtlesse he will be the most worthy of all mens envy. If he be worthy of my replyed Sapho. I should much feare I should not be worthy of pitty: For considering the constitution of my heart, if I should once love, I should love so tenderly, and in such good earnest, that it would be hard for any one to pay me back love with usury. Yet I am fully perswaded that to be happy in loving, one must at least believe that they are as much loved as they love; for otherwise one should be ashamed of their own weakness, and vexed at the neutrality of the other. Therefore Cydnon, though I doe believe one may innocently love, and though I think Phaon to be amiable, and that he hath an inclination to love me, yet I am resolved to do what I can, not to love him.

But Madam, whilst Sapho was talking thus with my sister, Phaon was talking with me of things very particular; and we two being always inseparable, we walked that Evening upon a Tarrass, the end of which was towards the Sea, by which one goes to Sicily: So as after we had walked a while, he leaned upon the Rayls by himselfe, and fell into such a profound musing. that I knew he never thought I was there. I had formerly observed many passages, which induced me to believe that he was in Love with Sapho, and therefore I knew he thought more of her then me. And to twitt him with it, I believe (said I unto him) that since you look so earnestly towards Sicily, you are thinking of that faire foole whom you loved there: Fie cruell friend (said he unto me) mock not at my misery, it is enough you have been the cause of it, without insulting upon a wretched man who hath changed his mind. Why (said I unto him) do you not think it better to love a faire foole, then a faire wise One? No no, Democedes (said he unto me) I think it so strange that I should ever love a witlesse woman, that I am perswaded I was out of my own wits, or never had any untill I came from Sicily: But deare friend (added he) before I discover the secrets of my soule unto you, tell me truly how you stand affected unto the faire Sapho: for if you be my Rivall, you are not fit to be my Confident. Doubtlesse I am a very great admirer of Sapho, replied I, but I never durst be her Lover: Then friend I am bolder then you (replied he) for I do love that divine Lady in so high a manner, as I thinke I shall loose my wits. When I first carried you thither, replied I, and smiled, you did not believe you could ever fall in love with any learned woman: Ah Democedes, said he unto me I did not think she had learned the Art of charming hearts but alas was mistaken: and I find you had good reason to say, that every one must be miserable before happy in Love: For such is the state I am in, that I find more delight in only meeting the eyes of Sapho, then I did in being loved by my fair fool: I found no difficulty in obtaining her esteem, and I wonder now that I did not scorn her. She looked upon me indeed very favourably, and looked upon me with eyes very faire: but they signified so little, and understood my mind so uery ill, that I wonder how I came to think her faire.

The truth is, Democedes, I am now very far from loving a faire fool, since I love Page_109 the fair Sapho, but alas, the grand difficulty is, to tell her as much, and to tell her that I would be loved; since friend, you have all accomplishments requisite to merit her esteem (replied I) how know you but you may winn her affection? I have been consulting with her eyes above these eight daies, (replied he) and endeavoured to divine my destiny, and whether I am so much in her favour as to discover my love unto her, but to tell you truly, I know not what to think; sometimes me thinks her eyes do give me some kind of far fetch hopes; and sometimes again they bid me despair, but however, all her looks augments my love, my heart trembles at every glance of her eye, which inspires me with such kind of I know not what delights, as I cannot express them; when I am with her, I can do nothing else but look upon her, wonder not therefore at my musing, (my dear Democedes) for my soul is so wholly taken up with this divine Lady, that though I speak, yet I cannot think of any thing but her. I can think of nothing, but what heavenly delight it would be to be beloved by such an Angell as she, & what an honour it would be, to infuse some weakness into so great a wit, as that of the most admirable Sapho, I am thinking of all that I can say unto her, and when I am alone by my self, yet I have long conference with her: The truth is, I do find the fair Sapho, to be very Civill, Sweet and obliging to me; but for all that, she trusts me with no secret, and I could never oblige her to shew me any of her verses. This most admirable Lady is so modest, (replied I) that her denyall need be no wonder unto you, for you have not yet been so long acquainted, as to come unto the honour of such a singular priviledge.

But however, you have this advantage (said I unto him) that unto this hour she never suspected you of ever loving any, though she knows you have a very passionate soul.

After this Madam, we retired, taking no notice whilst we talked, that the moon was in an Eclipse; but in our retiring we met Themistogenes with five or six men learned in Astrology; whom, he was carrying unto Damophile, purposely to argue with them in her presence upon this Ecclips: And we understood afterwards, that they spent almost all the night at her house in talking of the earths interposition between the Sun and the Moon, and many other things of that nature; so that all the noble company who used to meet at Saphoes, did much divert themselves at this adventure, for since Cynegeire (with whom Sapho dwelt) did very well know her wisdom and discretion, she permitted every one to go into her chamber, though Cynegeire was not present, so that Amithone, Erinne, Athys, Cydnon, Nicanor, Phaon, Alces, and I, being all with Sapho, we made the conversation verry pleasant, by having up all the follies which were in agitation at Damophiles, and though Sapho did not affect any Rallary in her presence yet she did not contradict this, but on the contrary, was the first which twitted Damophiles, to the end it might the better be known how great the difference was between them; so as making a very pleasant description of a confused company, she did extreemly divert all her own society. However, said Cydnon, we get this advantage from the foolish conversation of Damophile, that it serves to render ours more diverting, by the excellent discription which Sapho made of it; I wish she would also describe unto us, (replied Phaon) all other kind of fantasticall conversations which are to be found in the world: Indeed said Athys, it would be very pleasant if she would be pleased to take so much pains, as to observe all their impertinencies.

You put me upon a hard employment (replied Sapho) it would be much better and shorter, if every one in particular would describe that conversation which hath most wearied them: For my part (said Erinne) I am very glad of that; for I was yesterday in a company which I thought would have talked me to death, for I was in the midst of ten or twelve women, who talked everlastingly; but of no other subject than triviall domestique business, the fault of their servants, the good qualities of their children, and there was one woman amongst the rest, who spent an hour in repeating sillable after sillable, the first prating of her son, who was three years of age, judge I beseech you, what a fine time I had of it. I assure you (replied Nicanor) that I spent my time no better than you did; for I was much against my will engaged amongst a troop of women, who spent a whole day in talking of nothing but the goodness or the badness of their clothes, telling or asking Page_110 what they cost, some out of vanity said they, cost more than they did: Others to shew their skill in buying, said less: so I wished my part of the day out of the Callendar: For my part (replied the fair Athys) I was within these five daies with a company of Ladies, who though they had wit enough, yet were extreemly troublesome, for they were Ladies who were gallants by profession, who had every one their business, and business which did so wholly take them up, as they thought of nothing but taking one anothers gallants from them, by all manner of stratagems, so as though one were not of their intrigues, yet one should be engaged with them or else either be driven to a non plus, or non-plus them.

Indeed as long as I was with them, I heard them alwaies talking, but never understood what they said, for there was one on my right hand, who told her who was next her, that she knew such a one was broken off with such a one, and that this man had renewed with that woman, never naming any: And there was another on my left hand who talking to a Lady next her, the most foolishly that ever was heard, for (said she in a mighty fret) she you know of, need not to brag of taking my Gallant from me, since she had never gotten him from me, but because I had cast him off, and if the toy take me, I can call him again, and she shall never be the better for him as long as she lives, and the very truth is, I never was in all my life put so much out of all patience, as that day.

For my part (said Cydnon) had I been in your room, I would have laughed at them who wearied me, but I could not do so three days since at a man and a woman whose whole discourse was of two things, either of Mytellenian Geneologies, or of the estates belonging to families; for what delight can be taken in hearing tell a whole day together; that Zenocrates was the son of Tryphon, Clidemes son to Lenophantes, Lenophantes was descended from Tyreseus, & so they begot one another: Also what pleasure is to be taken in hearing one talk of such a house wherein you have no interest, nor ever had, no nor is ever like to have as long as you live; how it was built by such a one, bought by another, and exchanged by a third, and that it is now at this present in the possession of a man whom you know not? this question less is not very pleasing (replied Alcaes) but it is not so tedious as to meet with a man who has some peevish business in hand, and will not talk of any thing else: For I once met a Sea Captain, who pretended that Pittacus ought to make him recompence for a ship which he had lost, who held me three long and tedious hours in relating those reasons which he had for his pretence; and who will answer and reply and object and answer Pro, and Con, as if the case were pleading before a Judge: And the better to understand his loss, he would tell me by peece meale what he was forced to cast out of his ship, and would name every person in it, one after another when it was to no purpose in the earth.

Tis true said Amithone, that this is a very great persecution; but I must tell you, that grave and serious conversations, where every word is delivered in Querpo, and where the least smile is not permitted, hath something so tedious in it, that I am never amongst such, but my head akes, for one must alwaies speak in one tone never laugh, but be as composed as in the Temple; such company is very tedious (replied Phaon) but there are a sort quite opposite unto those who are infinitely against the strain of my fancy; for I was one day at Syracuse, with five or six women, and two or three men, who had a fancy, that to make the company more merry, could be continually laughing so that as long as they went together, they laughed at every word which one said unto another, there was no jeast or pleasant conceit in it, but made such a mad dinn as deafed one another, and laughed, only because others laughed without any other reason; but what is most strange is, that laughter has such a contagion sometimes in it, that there is no Antidote against the disease; but being one day amongst these eternall laughers, they so infected me, that I laughed untill tears trickled down my cheeks, and knew not any reason in the world for it: But to tell you truly, I was so ashamed at my self, that within a quarter of an hour after my joyes were turned into sorrows. Though it be much folly to laugh without any cause, (replyed Sapho) yet I should not be so much weary, with being in the company of such merry people, as with those whose discourse is nothing but telling such pittifull; and sad, long winded stories, as would tyre out Patience it self, for I know a woman who knows all the tragical adventures which [Page 111 ever hapned; who will spend a whole day in deploring the miseries of life, and in relating lamentable accidents in such a sad and languishing tune, as if she had been hired the sing to dolefull ditty of the worlds misery. Yet I do know a house where their discourse useth he be as irksome as possible (replyed Erinne) for they never talk of any thing but the trifling passages of their neighbour hood, of which Courtliers, unless by great accident, I never so much as heard of, or have any thing to do with, I have heard them name a hundred persons in one day, whom they know not; and they would talk of a hundred obscure passages, the noise of which never went out of the street where they were done, and which in themselves were so silly and so far from any delighting, as that they were very troublesome.

It is a great affliction, replyed Nicanor, to be in a great company where every one hath a secret, especially unto one who hath none nor any thing to do, but to heare that humming murmure, which they make who are talking in low voyces, yet were there whispers upon real secrets, replyed Sapho my patience would allow it: but often times they are only upon a triviall businessse no better then a Childs Rattle bought at the last faire. I know some people (added Alces;) who in my opinion are very weary some, though sometimes they are a little pleasing; for they have such a vaine of telling great News, as they never talke of any thing un|der a great Battle, on the seige of some considerable Town, or some grand re|volution in the world: and they would have you to know, that the gods did not alter the face of the Universe, but only to furnish them with discourse: for excepting these high stories, they have nothing to say, nor can endure any other talke: So as unlesse you know the very bottome of Policie, and have History at your fingers end, there is no talking with them of any thing. The truth is replyed I, it is very tedious, to harken unto such people: but such kind of People as without any care of the generall businessse of the world, will heare of nothing but privacies, are very troublesome for you shall see them always as busie as if they had a thousand great weighty affaires in transaction, though they are of no other nature then meddling in other mens matters, and running from house to house with this or that tittle tattle, as publique Spies, who are every where, and desire not the knowledge of any thing to any other end then to tell it again. All these kinds of people (replyed Sapho) are very obnoxious unto Civill societies, and the principall Rule of all Companies ought to be, never to utter any thing against sound judgment. I would gladly know (said Ni•a•or) how you would have our Conversation to be regulated. To speak in general, replyed she) our discourse ought to be more of things ordinary and gallant, then of any high matters, yet I conceive, that nothing but what is discreet must intervene: Our talke ought to be free, pleasing and pertinent according to the times, places & persons we talk of. To speak always nobly of inferiours simply of high matters, very gallantly of things gallant, and all without any affectation, or earnestnesse. And though conversation ought always to be naturall and reasonable; yet I must needs say, that upon some occasions, sciences may be handsomly brought in, and triviall follies may also have their place, provided they be ingenious and gallant. So as to speak rationally, I conceive there is nothing but may be brought into Conversation so it have wit: and judgment in it. But the most necessary quality to render it sweet and pleasant is a kind of Politnesse of wit which absolutly excludes all manner of biting je•st• and such as may offend a chaste eare.

I would have every one to have the Art of turning things so ingeniously as that they may without offence speak of gallantry unto the most Austere Nun in the world, and to tel a trifling tale unto the gravest and most serious men: to talk of Sciences and ignorance if they be forced; and to vary ones wit, according to the things talked of, and Persons to whom they talk: But above all, I would have a certain spirit of mirth to be predominant, which without any tincture of the follies in those Eternall Laughers who make a great noise upon a little matter may in|spire into the hearts of all the company, a disposition to divert themselves at any thing, and to be troubled at nothing: and I allow them to talk of greater matters provided still they talk well, and without any pumping for their words, and of such things as are fit to be talked of.

The Laws Madam, which you gave unto Conversation are such (replyed Phaon)Page 112 as whosoever shall admire your wisdom, and carry themselves as you do, will me|rit the admiration of the whole Earth, for never any had such an Art of pleasing of charming, and of diverting, as your selfe. I would all you say were true, (replyed she and blushed) and that I could beleieve you more then I do my selfe, but to shew you that I cannot, and that I know my self often faulty, I ingeniously de|clare that I have spoken too much, and that in lieu of telling you all my Conception concerning society, I should only have said as much of all the company as you have said of mee. After this, every one opposing the modesty of Sapho, we all commended her so highly that we more then half angred her, but afterwards the discourse was so gallant, so free, so pleasant and merry, that it continued til night when we all parted. Phaon who more fettered in the netts of Love then before, would needs stay the last with Sapho, and his passion was so fervent that he resolved to give it a little vent, and not to leave her untill he had given her some glimps of it: So that after we were all gone, he asked pardon for troubling her so long, but Madam (said he unto her) when I saw you only in company, me thought I did not see you enough. Tis true, I am much bettered by your Elegant discourse, and I do admire it more then any, but for all that, I am more joyed when I heare you in presence of none else; and two or three words only which are interrupted only by my selfe, do give me fuller satisfaction, and would more ravish me, then al your excellent Language wherewith you have charmed all the company this day, were you in Love with me (replyed she and smiled) I should think these expressions very gallant, but since I entertaine none but friends, and will never look upon any Lovers, I much chide you, for profiting no better by my discourse concerning Conversation. Since this your Language would be very sutable unto a Mistresse, but not unto a friend. I beseech you Madam, (said he) do you think my Language very sutable unto a Person whom I loved? you know I am always sincere, replyed she) and therefore you may beleive I speak my thoughts. Then Madam (replyed he and looked upon her) my Language is most sutable unto you, for I do not speak it only unto a friend, but unto one with whom I am most desperately in love: and that in such an humble and reverent manner, that you cannot be offended at me. If decency would allow me (replyed Sapho, and blushed) not to be offended at a declaration of Love, I believe I should not be offended at you: But Phaon it will not, and therefore I must either be angry with you, or else not believe you: Oh Madam (cried unto Phaon) never make any question between these two, but be certaine, that I had rather be treated ill, then not believed.

Since you never saw me angry (replyed she very gallantly) you know not what you say, but since I know what is good for you better then you do your selfe, I will neither be angry with you, nor believe you. Oh I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) believe me and be angry too, if you cannot beleieve me without being angry: for as I told you before, I had much rather see you angry then incredul|ous. Since believe is a thing not in our own power (replyed she) we cannot believe what we would: And therefore when I said that it was in my choise whether I should believe you or be angry with you, I conceive that I spoke improperly, and had better say, That it being impossible for me to believe you, it is also impossible for me to be angry with you. But I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) why cannot you believe that I love you? Is it because you think your selfe not fair and charming enough to captivate harts? Is it because I have not wit enough to know your transcendencies? Is it because my soule is frozen, and my heart incapable of any tender passion? Is it because my eyes never yet met yours, and told them what my heart thinks? Or is it because the most admired Sapho does think the un|happy Phaon so unworthy to beare her Chaines, that she had rather think him in|sensible, then suffer him to weare them? But Madam; say what you please, I can never believe that a Person who is so superlatively knowing in all things, should not know, that I adore her. I assure you (replyed Sapho gallantly) I am so farre from knowing it, that I am perswaded you do not know it your selfe. Therefore to do you all the favour that I can, I will give you three Moneths time to examine your own thoughts without mentioning the least sillable of any such thing unto me, and if after that you think still that you love me, I shall advise upon it whe|ther I should believe you and be angry: In the mean time, let us both live, I conjure Page 113 you as formerly we used, Sapho expressed her selfe with such a gallant aire that Phaon making no question but that she believed he loved her, he thought him|selfe very happy, in that he had said so much, and was no worse treated: And Sapho being unwilling he should force her to be angry with him, she dismissed him, and kept such a strict decorum in all her words; that if her eyes had not betrayed the secret of her heart, Phaon could not have gleaned any hopes: But since que|stionlesse she had a very strong inclination to him, her looks assured him, that his passion did not displease her: So as he went away well satisfied, and very extreame|ly fettered in love.

In the mean time, Sapho was not so well satisfied, for my Sister told me, that she was very unquiet. Not but that she had all the advantageous thoughts of Pha|on that was possible: but it was, because knowing the tendernesse of her own heart, she was afraid of being engaged to Love, and her feares were the more, be|cause she perceived in her soule such a favourable opinion of this Lover, that she feared her reason was too weak for her inclination. And she saw she had more reason to feare it, because she observed that. All which Alces said unto her in behalfe of the Prince Tysander, did much more displease her then before: and she observed that she did lesse divert her selfe amongst her friends, then she was wont before Phaons acquaintance. She could not choose, when the fancy of composing Verses was upon her, but think upon Phaon, and he did so much run in her memo|ry, in her heart, and imagination; that she would often name him for another: So that Cydnon did often in a jesting way ask her what progresse she made in the heart of Phaon? and what progresse Phaon made in hers? At the first, Sapho was wont to answer in merriment, as she asked the question, but afterwards her answers were more serious, and at last, her answers were so peevish, that Cydnon for a time gave over asking any more. But after a two Months silence concerning that subject, she who would not answer then unto any questions which were asked concerning Phaon, did now begin the first to speak of him. But the truth is, she began not to till after the consequence of an adventure which I shall acquaint you with.

Be pleased to know then, that a most admirable Limner whose name was Le|on, coming unto Mitylene, all the friends of Sapho were importunate with her to let her Picture be taken, and they were so very earnest with her, that she was forced to satisfie them in a very particular manner, for she was resolved to let every one of her friends have one, both women and men, so that her Lovers, to obtaine this honour, did all shroud themselves under the notion of friends, and they pretend|ed unto this honour in such a gallant way, as she knew not how to avoid it, for Nicanor, Phaon, Alces and my selfe, being one day at her house: And Amithone Erinne, Athys, and Cydnon being there also; we all began to oblige Cynegire to sollicite Sapho for her Picture, every one acquainting her with the rights they had to pretend unto it, so that Nicanor and Phaon, though the Lovers of Sapho, yet plead|ed as if they were only her friends: And Alces though Tysanders Solicitor, sued for this Picture, unto a pretence of Tysanders friendship, so as there was only I who said what I thought. It was worth observation, to see how Nicanor was vexed that he could not obtaine Saphoes Picture without Phaon had it as well as himself, and to see how ill satisfied Phaon was that Nicanor should have a Picture, which as he thought, he only deserved. Alces wished that neither of them might have it, and he merrily said that if Sapho would be ruled by him, she should give it unto none but himselfe, for (said he unto her) since my heart was engaged before I had the honour to see you, you may very well give me your Picture without feare of any dangerous consequences, but as for Nicanor and Phaon since none can see into their hearts, it is to be feared, that in thinking to give your Picture unto your friends only, you may give it unto your Lovers. As soone as Alces had said so Pha|on and Nicanor looked upon one another, as if they had been at a stand for an an|swer unto Alces, yet that trouble was saved then, for I speaking as for my owne interest since every one is for his self only (replyed I, in speaking to Alces) I neither speak for Nicanor nor Phaon, but I dare boldly affirm, that I may very well demand the Picture of the most admirable Sapho, only as the Brother of Cydnon.

Page 114 And I affirm, (added Phaon) that Alces is not in a condition worthy of it, though his merits are enough for since he is in love with another, and should be so happy as to get the picture of his mistress, then the picture of the most transce|ndent Sapho, would be placed below another. Since perhaps he shall never obtain that favour from his Mistress, (replyed Athys and blushed)

I cannot think that reason sufficient to hinder Sapho from granting her picture unto Alces, who I believe can never have a mistress, whom he will set above her. However it be (said Phaon) I think it not expedient that the fair Sapho, should give her picture unto any, but such friends as are not in love as Alces is: If so (said Nicanor unto Phaon) who can assure the fair Sapho, that you deserve to have her picture? For since you are but new come into Mytelene, and have been long in Scicily, it is probable you have a mistress there; but it is otherwise with me, for it is well known, that I use to visit none assiduously, but the fair Sapho, and that I was never guilty of any gallantry which might render me unworthy of her picture.

Since I came unto Mytelene, without any invitation of business, (replied Phaon) it is to be thought I was not in love where you mentioned, since I left it upon such easie tearms, but without any pumping for reasons to justify my self, I do consent that the fair Sapho refuse me her picture, if she think I was in love with any in Scicily.

For my part (said Amithone) if I were to be credited, none should have the fair Saphocs picture but my self. And if my advice would be taken, (said Erinne) I would have it sent over all the world, so I had it (replied Athys) it should be done as she pleased. And provided my brother had one (replied Cydnon) I should be contented she should deny it unto Alces, unto Nicanor, and unto Phaon, I conceive my best course is (replied Sapho) to give it unto none. No, no (said Cynegere) you shall not be mistress of your self: But least you should dis-oblige ainy, you shall give it unto all your friends without exception, for if you should except any one, perhaps you would do him a greater favour than in giving it. Though what Cynegere said might well have pleased all the company, yet Nicanor, and Phaon did argue the business between themselves; but at last, least they should loose the Picture of Sapho, they agreed upon the matter, since the one could not have it, unless the other had it also, since Sapho knew what Phaon had said unto her, she thought it expedient not to yeild so soon, but to take some particular exceptions against him, so as taking Nicanors part, she told Phaon, that perhaps he had twenty pictures which he would place before hers and there passed a very gallant discourse between them: For though he seemed to have no other design in protesting that he loved none in Scicily, but to obtain her picture, yet he made a thousand protestations of love unto her, which she understood very well, though she seemed as if she did not. Yet she did vere gallantly put him to the puzzle, when he was to answer. For (said she unto him) you think you have said enough when you have sworn that you loved none in Scicily, but believe me you have not; for you must swear also that you are in love with none in Mytelene.

Madam, (said he unto her, to get himself out of this great plunge) since I have seen none but you, me thinks it is not necessary to say any more then what I have already told you, for you know the course of my life since I came hither, as well as my self, I know so many lovely friends (replied she and smiled) that though you go no further than my Chamber, yet it is not impossible, but you may be in Love.

For my particular (replied Amithone) I shall not hinder Phaon from your picture; for I do declare that he is not in love with me: I can say so much of my self (replied Erinne) I can say more than that, (said Athys) since I dare answer for Cydnon, and my self. Though all this should be so (said Alces,) yet all's not enough to oblige Sapho to give her picture unto Phaon, for perhaps he is in love with her, and since she will bestow her picture only upon her friends and not her Lovers, it is requisite he swear, that he is not in love with her, if he would have her picture.

As for that replied Sapho, I will dispence with him, for I am perswaded his heart has no such thoughts of me, as may hinder me from giving him my picture. Since it is so (said Cynegere, and gave Phaon no time to answer) there need no disputes Page 115 upon a thing resolved upon: Therefore let the Artist begin his work to morrow: And indeed so Leon did, for he began to take the Picture of Sapho the next day.

Thus were the friends, the Lovers, and the Rivals of Sapho equally favoured, yet Phaons soule found abundance of sweetness in thinking that Sapho should know he loved her, and yet permit him her picture: But these sweet thoughts were molested by others which followed a little after: For he could not have any thoughts that Nicanor should be favoured as well as himself without a heart-burning: Yet since he did not know whether his Rivall had discovered his passion unto Sapho, he soothed up his soule with hopes. He knew also that Alces was Tysanders Confident, and they so assured him that there was no cause of any feares this way, that the picture which he was to have never troubled him.

On the other side, Sapho out of her violent inclination unto Phaon, was not sorry that Chance had given her such an innocent way of bestowing her Picture upon him: And she carryed her selfe in such an obliging manner towards him, that it was impossible she should be sorry for it.

He still keeps himself within his prescribed bounds, he hinted not the least syllable of his passion to her: But yet he made it appear unto her by so many several other wayes, that never any had a more subtle art of loving without speaking then he; and he did it so curiously without any affectation, that where soever she was, she could not choose but see it, and none else but she: if at any time she had any accident of Joy, he did so participate in it, that she judging of his love by his satisfaction, she judged aright: if on the contrary, and chance did separate him from her, he made his sorrows so discreetly appear, that the judging of his love by his Grief, she could not choose but think it great: The truth is, he spoke unto her, and was never heard; and he spoke in an Aire so discreet, so gallant, and so passionate, that she understood him as well as if he had used his tongue: if he looked upon her, his eyes told her what his heart thought, and I have observed a hundred times by a lovely blush which dyed the cheeks of Sapho, that shee understood the Language of his looks: and though she had no desire to answer him, yet her faire eyes did it for her whether she would or no. When her Picture was taking, and we looked on, she would look fixedly upon Phaon: and her thoughts of him being very advantageous, she had such a languishing and amorous Aire, though without any affectation, that Nicanor not being able to endure his Rivall should be so favourably looked upon, told her, that she looked not enough upon the Painter, to have her Picture well drawn, and that if she continued in that deep study, it would be taken too melancholic.

Nicanor had no sooner said so, but Sapho blusht, for she understood well enough out of what thoughts he spoke it: Yet she knew how to give him an answer so to the purpose, that she perswaded all the company it was impossible to have her Picture taken without being subject unto those kind of musings, which proceed (said she) from the constraint of not stirring.

As for Phaon, he was so vexed at Nicanor, that he contradicted him all the rest of the day. If Nicanor said that the Painter had happily hit upon the resemblance of Saphos eyes, Phaon would say, he thought not so, but that he had much better taken the smile of her mouth. If Nicanor said the picture was too pale, Phaon would say it was rather too high-coloured: and if the Painter should have wrought according to the various opinions of these two Rivals, they had had but a bad picture of their Mistress.

But that which was most pleasant in the contradicting humour of Phaon was, that after the Picture was first rudely taken, Nicanor said that it wronged Sapho, because she was a thousand times fairer then it: Phaon durst not contradict him, because if he had, he had said the Picture was fairer then her for whom it was made; but his eyes made it evident, that he was vexed because he could not contradict him: and because he would oppose him in something, he began to flatter the Painter.

Therefore (said he) it is no wonder if no picture can be absolutely resembling the most admirable Sapho, because there are so many Angelicall features in her face, and fire such in her eyes as is unimitable: and that he was perswaded Leon had done it as well as any other Artist could, though short of the Originall. All the Page 116 company knowing what the reason was which moved these men to thwart one another, we tooke much delight in hearing them; for since their dispute was not very bitter, because they respected Sapho more then to quarrell in her presence, we made our selves admirable good sport at them, and Sapho her selfe was not sorry to finde a new testimony of Phaons love, by his obstinate contradicting of Nicanor.

At the end of this Conversation, we had another diversion: For as we asked the Painter when he would be at leasure to take the pictures of the other Ladies, who intended to give Sapho their pictures, as she would give them hers; the Painter answered that it could not be the day following, nor the day after that, because he was very busie in finishing a great piece of Damophiles, which had abundance of work about it.

But why (said Sapho to him) is there more work about her picture than mine? because Madam (said he unto her) she will have drawn besides her, a great Table, full of books, a Lute, many Mathematicall instruments, and a thousand other things which may represent her learning and knowledge. I think also she intends her dresse to resemble the Muses, so as I assure you her peece will require much time before it be finished. For heavens sake Leon (said Sapho and laughed) dresse me like unto the ragged Shepherdess Onone, that my picture may nothing resemble Damophiles: and she was so earnest upon it, that to content her, he promised to draw her in the habit of a Shepheardesse, whereas before she resembled a Nymph. After which she did so pleasantly and innocently play upon the picture of Damophile, that we ended the day very pleasantly.

But Madam, to abbreviate my story as much as I can, be pleased to know, that Sapho's picture being finished, it was one of the most admirable peeces in the world. The habit of a Shepheardess did so become the Aire of her face, that never any was more amiable: so as all the Copies which shee was to give unto her friends being taken, and the pictures of Amithone, Athys, Erinne, and Cydnon being also taken, all these severall pictures were distributed: Sapho gave hers to her friends, and they gave theirs to her. But as for Nicanor, Phaon, Alces, and my selfe which were in the catalogue of her friends, we only thanked her for her most precious presents, but it was in a very different manner; for Nicanor who durst not speak of his passion, but thanked her, but under the notion of a friend, who durst not tell her that he was her Lover.

As for Phaon, he thanked her in such passionate Language, that though he did not pronounce the word Love, yet Sapho did hearken unto his Complement more then unto a Complement of amity. As for Alces, since he was still an officious Solicitor for the Prince Tysander, he told her in a low voyce, that he alone would not thank her for her precious liberality, but would stay untill a person of more merit joyned with him. So as I was the only one who payd the tribute of thanks out of pure amity, and common gratitude.

In the mean while, while Phaon being the most assiduous in his merits; hat day which he thanked her for his picture, he stayed the last with her. So as looking upon the Originall of the picture which yet lay upon the Table, he began to talk of the extravagant Damophile, who would have her picture drawn with so many Emblemes of knowledge about her: And afterwards he talked of what Sapho said, when shee desired the Painter to dresse her resemblant unto the Shepheardesse Onone.

However Madam (said he unto her) you may be sure you shall never have her destiny as you have her dress; for it is most impossible, if ever you love any, that he whom you love should forsake you. Though the Goddesses should every day have a fresh contest about their Beauties (replied she and laughed) yet perhaps when I am in the humour of loving a Shepheard as Onone was, he should never be their Judg: and his constancy would not be put unto such a difficult Test as her Shepheard was: Oh Madam (cried out he) if that happy Shepheard whom you shall choose have but the heart of Phaon, he will never hearken unto the promises of the fairest of all the three Goddesses, though she should shew him as much of beauty as made Paris perfidious: For really Madam, you are to me the only beauty in the whole world: I find none in it amiable but you; and my heart is so Page 117 wholly yours, that you deny it unto all other Ladies upon earth: And I think also (added he) that you keep it from all my friends; for I am so sensible of you, that I am absolutely insensible of any else. I pray Sir (said Sapho and interrupted him) consider well what you say; for if you go beyond the degree of a friend, you must restore my picture, for I will not be upbraided with bestowing it upon any Lover. No, no Madam (said he) I can never restore your Picture, I must lose my life before any have it out of my hands: and though you should be angry, banish me, and treat me with the worst of rigour, yet as long as I can do it without any witness, I must tell you that I do love you, and must beseech you not to hate me; for the very truth is, I cannot live unlesse I love you, and I cannot love you without telling you; and I cannot tell you, unlesse I conjure you to do justice unto the grandure and fidelity of my of passion by preferring it before the quality and merit of all my Rivals. I perceive Madam (continued he) that you prepare your selfe to give me an angry answers, but I am resolved to endure it with all imaginable respect, yet will not obey you if you forbid me, telling you how I love you: This is a new way (replied Sapho): will you professe disobedience, before the command be given which it is expected you should obey? However it be Madam (said he unto her) I am grown to that height that I cannot live as I have done; You must either let me love you, or command me to dye. Since I have no right to regulate your love or your hatred (replied she) I have nothing either to forbid or command you: and since you are a man of too many excellent parts for any to desire your death, I will lay no command upon you which shall oblige you to seek it: But I must tell you, that though I am perswaded, that without any offence of decency I may permit you to love me, yet out of generosity I ought to acquaint you, that I am the most difficult person in the world to be pleased: and therefore it is better not to engage your self in an affection which perhaps will not be durable, though at present it be very violent; for indeed there is in all men such a natural propensity into inconstancy, that though I were a thousand times fairer than I am, yet it were fond imprudence in me to believe I should find one absolutely faithful: Yet if ever I do admit of a lover, he shall be such a one as upon whom time and absence can have no power: Indeed I would have such a one as is not to be found in the world, and therefore I advise you to content your self with the quality of my friend; for if I do allow you to love me, perhaps you will find a most miserable task of it, or else you will give over loving me. Oh Madam (said he unto her) do what you can, I shall love you as long as any life is in me, and the matter rests upon nothing, but to know whether you will let me tell you that I do love you, and whether there is any hope of my being loved.

Since it is not forbidden to be curious (replied Sapho) I should not be sorry if I knew in what manner you are able to love: and therefore without engaging my self unto any thing, I am contented you tell me what thoughts this passion does infuse unto you, for until this hour I never knew any man who had not a thousand gross conceits of this passion, which I conceive of in a more pure and delicate manner. All I can say is, Madam (replied he) that you are so absolute Mistress of my heart, my mind, my will, and all my faculties, that you cannot but inspire my thoughts into me: Yes Madam, you need only let me know the way how you would have me love you, and you shall find in me a blind obedience unto your will; for the perfection of love is to will the same which the person loved doth will.

But Madam, without any tedious repetition of every circumstance of this Conference, I will only in short tell you, that Sapho without granting any thing unto Phaon, did not plunge him into any despair: And Phaon without obtaining any thing from Sapho, parted from her with a mind full of hopes; for though she said nothing to him that was very favourable, yet she said nothing that was displeasing; but her eyes gave her such sweet Language, that he could not choose but think himself very happy in the convixture: Yet he would have esteemed himself much more happy, had he heard the discourse which Sapho had the next day with my sister, for she opened her very heart unto her. Ah Cydnon (said she) how ill do I wish Democedes for acquainting me with Phaon? For he still continues constant in loving me, and I am afraid I cannot refuse his affection: I find my Page 118 reason doth but weakly defend my heart, and that it is so little my own, that if Phaons be not more mine than it is, I am in a most sad condition.

Moreover, I know not what my design is in discovering my weakness unto you: For sometimes I think it is to the end you should chide me, and make me repent, and sometimes on the contrary, to the end you should soothe me up in my follies. However, I am extremely vexed at the resentments of my soul, not but that I do find much sweetness in my inquietudes; but still my reason being yet not altogether prepossessed, it doth shew me the danger unto which I am exposed, by permitting the affection of Phaon to find entertainment: For it is almost impossible he should love me as I desire to be, and as impossible I should love him less than I do.

The truth is Madam, (replied Cydnon) that if you would have Phaon to love you, and never to think of marrying, it will be a hard matter for him to obey you, and yet he must (replied she) if he would have me love him, he must content himself with hopes of being loved, without pretending unto any further.

These Madam, were the thoughts of Sapho, and though she had a great inclination unto Phaon, yet she bridled it a long time, and would neither suffer him to tell that he did love her, nor to hope that she would love him, and yet lived very civilly towards him, and to that point, as she did not any longer conceal her writings from him, so that he and I being one day with her alone, we importuned her to shew us all her verses, and so earnestly, that at last she consented to shew us part of them; but since her modesty would not let her read them, she gave them unto us, and went into her closet to answer a Letter which she had received from one of her Cousins, but Madam, I am very sorry I cannot shew you what there we saw, not only because it would be exceeding delightful unto you; but because also you might see what a strange effect, the reading of these verses wrought in the heart of Phaon.

In the mean time, since I have not these excellent verses to shew you, I must endeavour to let you understand it some other way; imagine therefore Madam, that after Sapho had given us her verses to read, and was gone into her closet, Phaon began to read an Elogy, which formerly she had made unto my sister during her long absence; he found them to be so apt, so moving, so tender, and so passionate that his heart melted at the reading them, and stood above a hundred times to admire them. Afterwards, he read a song which she had composed upon my sisters return; where he found in few words all the raptures of joy, which the most fervent affection could infuse into an amorous soul, at the reseeing of a loved person, after a long separation: Then Phaon read another little piece of Saphoes Genius which she had writ to express her joyes upon her unexpected meeting of a person which she loved, her expressions were so significative as it was apparent they were her own: She admirably described the sweetness of Looks, the trembling of Heart, which a sudden surprise useth to cause, the disorder of the Countenance, the agitation of the Spirits, and all the motions of a passionate Soul. But Madam, after Phaon had read these verses aloud, he read them again in a low voice to himself, and when he had done, he looked earnestly upon them without a word speaking, or ability to read others.

I being desirous to satisfy my curiosity, rowed him out of those musings which I thought his admiration only had caused, and forced him to read those Verses which Sapho had made upon a jealous amity which had been betwixt Athens and Alcibiades: But Madam, This jealousy had the right Character of Love, and all the violencies which that tyrannical passion could possibly inspire into an amorous heart, were so admirably expressed, as it was absolutely impossible to mend them.

For my part I did nothing but applaud and admire the genius of Sapho, all the while Phaon was reading that piece, but as for him, he read it with attention so full of pensiveness as I began to wonder; yet to lose no time in asking him the cause I set my self to read some Verses which Sapho had made in the Country, during a little journey of eight hours which she went alone with my Sister unto a very pleasant house of Saphoes, by these Verses she represented the felicity of two Persons who love one another, and thereby proves that they stand in need of none but themselves to live happily, describing afterwards the tenderness of their affections; their sincerity one unto another, their delights, their recreations, their discourses, Page 119 upon the sweetness of amity and friendship, and a thousand such like. And Madam, all that the most delicate love could invent of sweetness was described by these lines, though it aggravate only the sweets of amity, and never in my life, did I see any so full of Wit, so gallant, and so passionate: But as excellent as they were, I could not read them out, for Phaon who harkened unto them with extraordinary attention, interrupted me with these words. Ah Democedes (said he unto me) Sapho is the rarest Person in the world, but I am the most miserable Lover upon Earth, and you the most subtle of all men living: As for the first of these you mention (replied I) I concur with you, but I do not understand the second nor the third, for why are you the most miserable Lover in the World? and why am I the most subtle of all men living? I am the most miserable Lover (replied he) because Sapho is most certainly in love with some one: And you the most subtle, because you assure me she is not in Love with any. But I beseech you (said I unto him) upon what do you ground your opinion that she loves any one? I ground it, replied he upon what I have read: For Democedes it is absolutely impossible she should write so passionately and tenderly, unless she had experimentally been passionate.

As Phaon said so, Sapho returned, expecting a thousand applauses from Phaon, But Madam, if I had not commended her she had gone without a debt which was due unto her merit: for Phaons mind was so stung with a causeless jealousy which sprung in his heart, that he could hardly speak. Yet after I had given him time to recollect himself, by my commending of Sapho: The same jealousy which caused his silence, made him break it, to see if he could discover in the eyes of this excellent Lady, whether he had any ground for his suspicions. What I see here Madam is so surprising (said he unto her) that you must not think it strange I should not be able to express my admiration: Since Sir answered she) you have now been long enough acquainted with me to know that I do not love to be commended in my presence, you would do me a pleasure if you would speak no more unto me of what you have seen.

Oh Madam (said he hastily) I must needs speak something, and ask you boldly, what you do with all that tenderness, wherewith your heart is filled? for I have read such passionate expressions, that the heart of the Writer must needs be well experienced, and capable of Love: It is so, with the merit of my friends (replied she and blushed) and my affection to them is so tender, that if I had as much wit as amity, I should have written more passionately than I did. Phaon eyeing Sapho very attentively, he observed her blush, yet he could not divine that it was in his advantage, and that Sapho had not changed colour as she answered him, but because she secretly chid her self for having too tender thoughts of him.

But on the contrary, interpreting her blush another way, he thought that Saphoes soul was passionate for some of his Rivals, and this belief did raise such a disordered damp in his spirits, that he was silent upon a sudden: And if company had not come in, doubtless his silence had seemed very odd unto the fair Sapho; but since Nicanor, Phylire, and some other Ladies came in, Sapho made hast to hide those Verses which she had shewed unto us, so as she took no notice of Phaons silence.

In the mean time, perceiving his mind much unquiet, he made a sign unto me, that we should go away: and indeed, whilst Sapho was entertaining these Ladies, we went out without taking leave, and we went to walk by the Sea side. We were no sooner there, but Phaon began to complain against me; for (said he) how can it be possible you should be brother unto Saphoes best friend, and not know that she is in love? for most certainly so she is, or has been, for it most absolutely impossible that any should express themselves so passionately, as she hath done, unless she had experimentally been possessed with that passion: There is such odd, tender, and passionate phrases in those lines which Sapho shewed us, that friendship alone could not suggest them unto her, but absolutely she either is in Love or hath been, for my part (said I unto him) I have known Sapho from her Cradle; I have known all her acquaintances, I am the brother of one who knows all the secrets of her heart, and I do solemnly protest unto you, that I am most confidently persuaded, though Sapho was loved by every one that saw her, yet she never was Page 120 in love with any; but withal let me tell you that I think her very capable of that passion, and if ever it enter into her heart, she will love with more tenderness and fidelity than ever any did: Alas Democedes (said he unto me) you do either deceive me, or else are deceived your self: for Sapho could never write those verses unless she were in love with some or other. But friend (said I to comfort his mind) if you had seen any of those lines which Sapho writ upon a victory which Pittacus obtained, you would say she can write as well upon war as upon Love, and by her writings you may as well infer that she is a soldier, as in love, Alas Democedes (said he unto me) the case is not the same, for the very reading of Homer, is enough to teach one how to speak of war, but it is Love only which can teach one how to speak of Love.

For my part, replied I, I know not how you argue, but I am sure Homer speaks of Love as well as War, and Sapho might learn to speak as he did. Ah Democedes, (said he with a pensive look) gladly would I believe it was you who taught Sapho to write so passionately as she doth, for if you did not, you would say as I do, and swear that it is impossible any should write well of Love, and not be in Love, if you do but compare those expressions of Homer, with those of Sapho, you shall find a vast difference, honest Homer does better set out the friendship of Patroclus and Achilles than he doth the Love of Achilles and Prius; had Sapho only used such high expressions as Love doth cause, and not used them passionately, I should have believed as you do, that she might have writ of Love, and not have loved any.

But Democedes, she has such delicate, tender, and passionate fancies, as are impossible to proceed from any heart, but such a one as is in love, the truth is, I know it by my own experience, for when I returned unto Mytelene, I must ingeniously confess, that I did not know what Love was, but in such a gross manner, as I should never have understood the depth of Saphoes lines: And that fair fool whom I loved in Sicily, did inspire me with thoughts only proportionable into her own wit: Therefore my love of Sapho, hath taught me to know infallibly, what is in her heart, and I have now nothing else to do, but to learn who that happy one is whom this fair one loves, and inspires her with such tender, and passionate thoughts. Therefore my dear Democedes (added he) if it was not you who taught her this Art, then help me to discover whom it is she loves, to the end I may of two courses, take the one of them; either to cure my self, or else to ruin my Rival. Seriously (said I unto him once again) I cannot possibly believe that Sapho is in love with any: for it is most certain, that she neither loves the Prince Tysander, nor Nicanor: For these two Lovers kept such jealous eyes upon one another, that they would have found it out, had there been any cause of suspicion given them; and therefore friend, you have no cause to trouble your mind with any such fantastical and ill grounded jealousy. I know not Democedes (said he unto me) how its possible you should think as you say: For my part, though I had seen with my own eyes, and heard with my own ears, a thousand passages which might persuade me, that Sapho either is, or hath been in Love, I could not more confidently believe it then I do: Therefore if it be so, that you are not in love with this fair person; nor have any manner of hidden interest, in saying as you do, I conjure you to employ all your ingenuity, in discovering what I desire to know: Cydnor loves you so dearly, and you have so much wit of your own (added he, and flattered me) that if you will, you may quickly finde out, who that happy one is, which reigns in the heart of Sapho, and inspires her with such passionate thoughts. Oh! Heavens (said he) how worthy should I think my self of envy, if the most admirable Sapho had such thoughts of me, as she has of some other; the greatest wonder to me is, that he should have the honour to make her in love with him, and that their correspondencies should not be discovered, and how is it possible he should conceal so great a felicity?

After this, Phaon used a hundred expressions, which made both his Love and his Jealousy equally apparant, and I did promise him to be as carefull in enquiring of what he desired to know, as if I had been as fully persuaded of it as he was. In the mean time, I was certain that Sapho loved none, unlesse she loved him, and that her writing so passionatly, proceeded only from a naturall tenderness of her Soul. Yet for the satisfaction of my friend, I asked my sister the question, as if Page 121 had doubted it: But I asked her in vain, for she did not so much as tell me that she began to love Phaon, so as telling Phaon that I could not discover any thing, he was extremely disquieted, and confessed since, that sometimes he believed Sapho loved me, and that her friendship unto my sister was but her umbrage to shroud her affection unto me.

In the mean time since he could not discover any thing which might confirm him in his beleife, he durst not make it appear unto me, and yet he could not so constrain himself, but that I perceived his soul was in a very Hell: And indeed, this fantastical jealousy did torment him in such a cruell manner, that all the world perceived it as well as I, that he was extremely troubled. Sapho herself, asked him the reason of the alteration in his humour, but he durst not tell her, nor durst he speak any more to me by reason of his jealous fancies, so as he did live a melanchollick life. Moreover, since it was not possible for him but to hear many of Saphoes verses repeated every day, this was a dayly fresh torment unto him, for he could not hear them without a tremble of heart: Again, he kept an observant eye upon all the men which used to come often unto Sapho, and also he was very vigilant over some who never came there: And jealousy did never torment any person more than it did Phaon; though he had no cause, but was the only one that was loved of all Saphoes Lovers. He knew not what to do, nor what to think, to clear suspicions: So as he resolved to go into the Country for a while, and try if that would cure him, both of his Love, and of his jealousy, he took up this resolution without imparting it unto any, insomuch as I was much surprized at his departure: Sapho also murmured much, that he would not bid her adue before he went, and all the rest of his friends did nothing but ask the reason.

In the mean time, so it chanced, that I had some business which called me into the country, and I went two days after Phaon, I was no sooner out of Mytelene, but the Prince Thrasibulus landed there, to leave the Prince Tysander in that place, whom the invincible Cyrus, who then named himself Artamenes, had wounded in severall places, when both falling into the sea, they had a combate together so admirably strange, and extraordinary, that the Prince Thrasibulus, who was then called the Famous Pirate, had as great a desire to save the life of his enemy, who had so bravely resisted him, as the life of a friend, who was infinitely dear unto him: But Madam, to wave this passage, the Prince Tysander returned to Mytelene yet worse of those wounds, which the eyes of Sapho had made in his heart, than of those he received from the illustrious Artamenes, who honoured the fair Sapho with a visit, which satisfied her so well, that she spoke of none but him for a long time.

But at last, the Prince Thrasibulus went away, and left Tysander there, I also returned to Mytelene, and Phaon hearing of his Rivals being returned also; but his jealousy was it which caused his return: imagin, that perhaps it was the Prince Tysander whom Sapho loved, though none spoke of it. When he was returned, every one did chide him for his sudden departure; but he did so little hearken unto their Rallary upon it, as they gave over talking any more of it. Sapho, she gloomed, and would not speak to him. Also she being persuaded, that his solitariness was an effect of his Love unto her, she pittied him, and would not twit him with it.

In the mean time, Alces was a close Solicitor for the Prince Tysander, but all his solicitations would not do, for she would not give him any favourable countenance: And indeed, she was not in a condition for it; for she did already love Phaon very tenderly, or at least had a strong inclination to him. Yet since the merit and the quality of Tysander did oblige her to look well upon him, she denied him her heart without any incivility, and without denying him her esteem; yet she had a great quarrel with Alces, for giving unto Tysander, that picture which she had bestowed upon himself, yet he knew so well how to excuse himself, that she did pardon him in her heart, though she alwaies said, she would never pardon him.

On the other side, Sapho having many envyers, there were some Ladies who told Tysander, that Sapho had given her Picture unto so many, only as a shroud to cover her giving it unto Phaon, and they spake so highly of this fresh Lover of Sapho, that jealousie joyned it self with love to torment him.

And as fewell to the fire, Tysander found that Phaon was so amiable, as he was Page 122 apt to believe him beloved: So as both of them were a like jealous. Nicanor for his part, hee was not exempted since he was jealous both of him that was loved, and of him that was not, for he feared least the Quality of Tysander should win much upon Sapho, and he feared no lesse, least the extraordinary merit of Phaon should make him miserable.

In the mean time this beloved Lover who made all his Rivals unhappy, was no more happy then they were, for often seeing the tender and passionate Verses of Sapho, his jealousie augmented every minute. Alas (would he often say) how great would my felicity be, if in reading all these passionate expressions, I could hope to be Loved by a Person, who knows so well how to love? and who by the tenderness of her heart does assure all those she loves of a thousand felicities, which others are ignorant of, and which the greatest beauties of the World knows not how to give.

For beauty only hath no further attraction, but what the grace of novelty doth give it. But the tenderness of an amorous and passionate heart is an unexhaustible source of fresh delights, which spring newly every moment, & which augments love with Time, whereas commonly Time doth diminish it. But the worst is, the tenderness of Sapho, being for another, she makes me as miserable as she makes that other happy. And all her tender and passionate Lines which would be so many joyes unto me if I were Loved: do now most horribly afflict me, because I am not loved. Phaon then being thus restlesse, not knowing what to do, nor trusting any more in me, he thought that if he could see all that Sapho had written, perhaps he might pick something out which might satisfie him, and come to know who it was which inspired her with such tender and passionate thoughts: So as after this, he asked every one he met for the Verses of Sapho, and was importunate also with her, when he was alone with her: Also when he was with her, he used to look continually upon her table, whether she had left any papers upon it: In the end, he resolved to suborne one of Saphoes women, under colour of curiosity only to see her excellent Verses, to steale them out of her Mistress Closet, but do what he could, he could not corrupt her: But as last an accident chanced without which perhaps he had never seen them, and which caused a great disorder and restlesnes in his mind.

Be pleased to know then Madam, That the Prince Tysander being recovered, he came to see Sapho, and came with abundance of company; so as this visit affording no fit opportunities of making his complaints unto the faire Sapho, the discourse was only upon things indifferent: And since Cynegire, with whom she lived, had much repaired, and beautified her house, since the departure of that Prince, they talked very much of what she had done, especially of Saphos Closet which had been much adorned with painting since Tysanders departure. This Prince, desiring then to see it, and she not daring to deny him, she opened the Dore, and all the company went in. So that Phaon entring amongst the rest, he observed that Sapho seeing some Papers upon the Table she blusht, and hasted to put them into a Box halfe open, which her hast perhaps made her forget to shut againe. And Tysander having drawn her to the window (under pretence of a fine prospect to talk a little in private with her) she had not time to shut it close, Phaons jealousie was upon the Rack to see these papers which made her blush, and which she was so hasty to put up. So that to lose no time, whilst Tysander was talking with Sapho, and whilst others were looking upon the Pictures in her Closet, he went gently to the Box, and took out the papers. After which not being able to stay in that place he went into the Chamber againe, to see whether he ought to keep them, or put them where they were.

He no sooner opened the Paper, but he saw they were Verses, and verses written with Saphoes own hand So as not judging he could have conveniency of reading them in that place without interruption and seeing by the first words that they deserved his curiosity, hee went out of the house, and went to walk alone in a Garden which was by the Sea side, and which was alwayes open to all Commers, as soon as he was there, he opened the paper, and there read these verses, which I am Page 123 now going to shew you, for I had them, as he had them that is, without the name of that Person for whom they were made, as you may perceive by the Copy.

My paine is great; extreame is my delight:

I muse all day; I sleep not in the night:

To say I am in Love, I cannot yet,

But yet I'me sure, this doth resemble it.

One only object takes up all my mind;

In nothing else can I a pleasure find:

If this be it, to have a wounded heart,

Ther's none can be more sensible of smart.

My soule is set on fire by certaine Rayes;

The Sun lesse pleaseth in the chillest dayes:

No eye as yet doth see my flame; but sure

Fire has no heat in't more then I endure.

When I see—then my soule's at ease

He out of sight, ther's nothing can me please:

Perhaps he is my vanquisher; but yet,

I will be ignorant of my defeat.

All that he sayes, seemes full of charms to mee;

And in his silence, no felicity,

Hast thou laid down thy Armes, oh heart so brave?

I cannot tell, but I believe I have.

After the Queen of Pontus had read these lines, she restored them unto Democedes, conjuring him to tell her what operation these verses had in the spirit of Phaon.

I understand since from himselfe, Madam (replyed Democedes, and continued his relation) that these verses did raise such a storm in his heart, that He was halfe an hour before he could begin to read them againe, though he had a great desire unto it: for though he did believe that Sapho either was then in Love, or had been in love, yet he did not believe it so confidently, but he was strangely surprized to see it under her own hand: But at last beginning to read these verses over againe, and finding them more amorous the second time then the first, he was so tran[s]ported with furie, that he thought to have tome them all in peeces and thrown them into the Sea. And as he was just ready to doe it, a fancy came into his head which prevented him, which was, to consider whose Name of all those who used to frequent Saphoes company, did most concurre and sute with the verse, in that blank which was left for it. For he conceived (notwithstanding his furie) that if Sapho would have given him any other name then his owne, she would have writ it down in her verse. So he concluded, and rationally, that the name which would fit the verse was the name of him for whom they were made: therefore looking againe upon those foure verses where it was written.

When I see—then my soule's at ease;

He out of sight, ther's nothing can it please:

Perhaps he is my Conqueror, but yet,

I will be ignorant of my defeat.

He began to consider what name would make up the verse: but he was there at a great puzzle. For that of Tysander was too long a syllable: That of Nicanor the like, and mine was longer then either. Phaon fond, that the name of Alces was the just length for the verse, but his love of the faire Athys was so well known un[t]o all the world, and it was also well known that he was Tysanders confident, that Page 124 this made no impression upon his mind. Afterwards, he examined the Names of all the men of Rank which used to visit Sapho, but found none which fitted the verse, because they were all too long, also he examined the names of all those who did not visit her, neversomuch as thinking of his own. For since he knew that Sapho had made those verses which caused his first jealousy before he knew her, he never dreamed that those which had caused him so much sorrow, would have caul[sed] much joy, had he known the cause: and he was farre from any such thoughts as that he had never examined whether his own name did fit the verse, when I accordingly came unto him. But Madam, the wonder was, to see Phaon, who since his fantastickall jealousy looked very much a squint at me, now become very kind againe, because my name did not fit the verse, so as he accosted me with his accustomed freedome; and took me for his confidant as familiarly as if I had never caused any of his jealousy. And he no sooner saw me, but comming to me, since we are both in the wrong (said he unto me and embraced me) I beseech you my dear Democedes, let us forget what's past, and begin our amity a new, for now I plainly see I was in the wrong in thinking it was you who had taught Sapho to know all the delicacies of Love, and I can make it appear unto you that you were in the wrong to believe, she was not in love. Is it possible (said I unto him) That you should have such clear testimonies of it, as cannot be doubted? You shall quickly see that (said he) by reading these verses which I stole from her, you know her stile and her hand, and happily may guesse at the name of him for whom they were, made, for my mind is so full of perplexities, that I confesse I cannot guesse at him; After this, I begin to read Saphoes verses, but in reading them I found at the very first, that the name of Phaon fill'd up the verse, and I remembered so many passages which had made me believe that Sapho did not hate him, as I made no doubt but that they were made for him, and I did the more believe it, because I could not find any name except that of Alces which did run right in verse, and as for Alces I knew it could not be him, so as intending to comfort him, for my part (said I) I see no such difficulty in finding out a name which will fitly fill up the blank in the verse, and I am confident the fair Sapho did intend it thus.

When I see Phaon then my soul's at ease

He out of sight, ther's nothing can me please

Perhaps he is my vanquisher, but yet

I will be ignorant of my defeat.

Ah Democedes (cried he out) Tis true indeed, my name does fit the verse, but the verse fits not me, and I cannot choose but wonder how you should so suddenly think upon my name. As for my part, did not so much as think upon it whether or no my name was Phaon. However this accident ads no comfort unto me, for all these excellent, tender, amorous and passionate Copies of the faire Saphoes were all written before I ever knew her, and therefore it is to be thought they were made for some other happy one who has the felicity to teach her all the tendernesse of Love, in making himself Loved.

For my part (replied he) I know not whether I be mistaken; but me thinks those Characters do not look as if they had been long writ. But I am the most mistaken man in the world if these verses were not made for you, and if you in lieu of being the most miserable, are not yet the most happy Lover in the world.

How? (said he) do you think Sapho could love me and I not perceive it? and that a man who looks upon her every minute; observes all her Actions and all her words, and does all he can to guesse her thoughts, should not he see she loves him? Ah Democedes, this is impossible, and it is but too true, that these verses were ne[ve]r made for me. As he said so, we heard a great noise of many people talking, and turning about, we saw comming towards us, the Prince Tysander, leading Sapho who had with her all her friends, Nicanor, Alces and many others. So as restoring back the verses unto Phaon, he hastily put them in his pocket. But Sapho having observed that Phaon left them abruptly, she began to chide him, and chid him in such a gallant manner for preferring solitude before such good company, that he was obliged to walk along with them, and so we both did, though we had Page 125 no great fancy unto it, for she was very pensive, and I had some other businesse. But at last, we came unto the end of the Garden which was towards the Sea, where we found a Barque, into which we went, and chance placing Phaon very neere Tysander and Sapho, he plainly saw the verses were not made for that Prince, for Salpho did not answer him with so much as one favourable look, but was so cold and hollow towards him, as it was easie to see there was no great sympathy of hearts. In the mean time, he was so taken up with his own thoughts, that he had no share in the generall conversation.

That which I had said unto him comming often into his imagination he often sweetly flattered up himself, but presently after beginning to think upon the amolrous expressions which Sapho used, and that they were written before he knew her, his jealousy revived; So as passing from hopes to fears, he entertained himselfe, and talked unto none, he fell into a deep study and leaning over the Barque, hee looked attentively upon that bubbling froth which is alwayes at the Prow of those Barques which saile swiftly. Phaon was too dear in the esteem of Sapho, for her not to observe his pensiveness, so as she both took notice of him, and caused others to take notice also. But amongst the rest, Tysander who knew Phaon was in love with Sapho, and that Sapho did not hate Phaon, he kept a very observant eye upon him, endeavouring to find out, why he was so melanchollick, and if it were possible to find what the cause was, because he was in Saphoes disfavour, or else whether it was only because he was too much in love with her. So as looking up[on] him no less then upon Sapho, It unhappily fel out that Phaon in taking some[th]ing out of his pocket, not knowing what he did, and without interrupting his musing, he puld out Saphoes verses also which fell at the feet of Tysander, who see[ing] them fall, stoop'd and unperceivdly took them up: But Madam after he had read them, he was no lesse pensive then Phaon, for in a thought that he was his Rivall, he feared to find that which he would not have sought, but in hopes not to find it.

In the mean time, Cydnon seeing that Phaons musing troubled Sapho, she began to speak unto him, and and aske him the cause, which you may well imagine hee would not tell her. But Sapho's verses running much in his mind, he put his hand in his pocket to feele whether they were there; though he doubted it not; for it is very customary for those in Love to do many things which they would not do, were their reason free: Phaon then finding them not in his pocket, was strangely amazed when he saw that he had them not: Yet he durst not expresse his wonder, nor say he had lost them; for if he had, he had acquainted Sapho with his theeev[er]y, and should have been extreamly ashamed. Moreover, not knowing certainly whether he lost them in the Garden, or in the Barque, or whether they were fain into the Sea, he durst not make Hue and Cry after his losse, especially for Sapho's sake, and her concernment: For though he was very jealous, yet he was very re[s]pective of her, and her glory was more considerable unto him, than his owne tranquility: so as he contented himselfe with looking all about him, not telling what he looked for: but as he was very earnest in it, though he did endeavour to do it without any affectation, Tysander knew very well that what his Rivall had lost did wring him at the heart, and that what he had found would perhaps be a sad satisfaction of his doubts. But at last, our Maritime diversion being en[d]ed, we waited upon the Ladies home, and conducted also the Prince Tysander unto his Lodging; who as soon as he was there, went into his Closet, opened the Paper which he found, and read those verses which troubled him, as much as they had his Rivall.

But Madam, he was not so much puzzled as his Rivall was, to find out the name which was to fill up the imperfect verse; for he never doubted, but that Phaon was the name, and he beleived also, that Sapho had given these verses unto his Rivall, with her own hand, and that the knot of affection between them, was already so fast tyed, that nothing could unloose it: You may imagin Madam, how vexatious were these thoughts unto him, and he said since, that never any thing in his life did more trouble him: Phaon on the other side was far from any quietness of mind; for maugre his jealousy, he was extreamly sensible of Saphoes reputation, who was in as great a perplexity as he was: For Madam, this excellent Lady did so repent Page 126 of leaving those verses in danger of being seen, that as soon as ever she returned home, she went into her Closet with intentions to burn them, and never to make a[n]y of the like nature again; but shee was much surprized and afflicted, when shee could not finde them in the place where she put them: She would not trust unto her memory, but searched in all other places, where there was any possibility of their being, but at last concluding that questionless they were stoln from her, she was so extreamly afflicted, that never in all her life she was the like.

However, in this perplexity of spirit, she could not imagin a wish more sweet, then that it might be Phaon who had taken away these verses, though she was much ashamed he should ever see them, for being ignorant of his jealousy, she imagined he would apply them unto himself, but though she wish'd it, yet she could not hope it was Phaon who had them, because she saw him so sad, she could not suspect him.

And remembering that he went from her house immediatly after Tysander came into her Closet, she could not think he had time enough to commit the theft, so that not knowing whom to suspect, she was infinitely troubled.

On the other side, Tysander seeing by these Verses that Sapho loved Phaon, and not doubting but that his Rivall had received these verses from the hand of his Mi[st]ress, and that the knot of their affections was undissolvably tyed, he resolved to overcome his passion, but to carry his respects of Sapho as far as possible: And though Alces was his Confident, yet he did not shew him these verses.

Tis true, he was three whole dayes in consulting upon this resolution, during which time he did not see Sapho, who for her part avoided all company as much as she could for fear of hearing of these verses.

On the other side, Phaon durst not see her; for he perceived, it would be im[p]ossible for him not to give her many testimonies o^f his troubles, pensiveness, and jealousy. Nicanor, he was so puzled to finde out the reason why these two Rivals and his mistress should be all so solitary at one time, that he was no less unquiet than they were.

But at last, Tysander striving with himself, he was Conquerour, and sent unto Sapho, to desire a private Conference, about some businesse of concernment; Sapho not daring to deny him by reason of his quality, consented; but it was with regret, because she feared his business was about the Verses: Not but that she thought it impossible it should be him who took the Verses out of her Closet, for she had him alwaies in her eye, but her fear was, some other had given them unto him.

In the mean time, this hour of audience being come, Tysander went to Sapho, without any one to wait upon him; but in Lieu of accosting her as usually, he sa[l]luted her with a faint, and serious civility, though with much respect, which did infer unto her, that he had some angry business to impart: None but they being in the Chamber, Tysander had the freedome of talk, so as loosing no time, I come now Madam, (said he unto her) to render you the greatest testimony of my love that ever any did, by restoring unto you those verses which Phaon lost, and which you gave unto him:

And truly, any other besides my self would in revenge of your cruelty, have shewed them unto all the world; but my respects of you are so great, that notwithstanding your rigour, I am afraid to displease you, and would gladly preserve your esteem, though I cannot obtain your affection.

In saying so, Tysander gave Sapho those verses which she made for Phaon his Rival, he gave them open, and let her see how he had supplied the blank with the name of Phaon. You may well imagin Madam, that Sapho did not take these verses without a blush, yet after a little recollecting her self, she attempted to do two things at once: The first, absolutely to disengage Tysander from her affection: And the second, to persuade him, that these verses were made, neither for Phaon in particular, nor for any other in generall.

But all her Sophistry, her Rethorick, and her Arguments, could not reach half of her desires, for though she did disengage Tysander from loving her, yet she could not make him beleive, that these verses were made for any other then Phaon. She could not persuade him, but that she gave them unto Phaon with her own hand though she told him true, when she said he stoln them from her. No, no Madam: Page 127 (said Tysander to her) you can never persuade me to it, for she who can give a heart, may well give verses; one may sometimes give a heart (replied Sapho) and yet give nothing else: And this circumstance which you so much undervalue, is so considerable to me, that there is no comparison between my making verses for Phaon, and giving them unto him with my own hand: Suppose I had a very strong inclination to him, it would be no such wonder, if I should tell my self the thoughts of my own heart; and though it be a weakness, yet it thwarts not the Laws of modesty, since none should know it but my self. But Sir, you have done me so great a wrong in accusing me, of giving these verses unto Phaon, and you think so strangly of me, that I wonder you have not divulged them unto all the word, for if I were so indiscreet as to give these verses unto Phaon, I were also unworthy of so much discretion in you.

However, I give you thanks for restoring them, and conjure you to tell me trully how you came by them, for since I hold no particular correspondency with Phaon, I cannot know it from any but your self. Oh Madam, replied Tysander, my actions do not merit this incredulity: yet since perhaps Phaon will not tell you that he lost those verses which he should so carefully have kept, I will tell you that I saw them fall out of his pocket, that evening when we took the air upon the Sea, and I took them up, not knowing they included the sentence of my death. Phaon was so sad that evening (replied she) as me thinks you may be persuaded, I did not give these verses unto him, and that he did not think they were made for him. For to tell you truly, the conquest of Saphoes heart, is not so easie a matter, as that he should have the vanity, to think he hath done it: or to be joyed at it.

However it be Madam, (said Tysander) I am most confidently persuaded that Phaon is as much loved as I am hated, and if I had not more respective thoughts of you than ever any ill treated Lover had, I should find means how to send back Phaon into Scicily.

But since it would be in vain to banish him out of this isle, because I cannot banish him out of your heart, I will not, Madam, be your Tyrant, after I have been your Slave: But Madam, in acknowledgment of my respects, I beseech you be sincere, and ingeniously confess the true state of your Soul, as I have mine unto you, to the end I may leave you at rest, and endeavour to recover mine. Sir, (replied Sapho and blusht) if I were able to give you my affection, as I am my esteem, doubtless I should, in acknowledgment of your generosity; but to be sincere with you Sir, there hath been ever such a powerfull obstruction in your design of obtaining my Love, that do what I can, I shall never be able to remove it: And after this Sir, be satisfied, and ask me no more, for since I cannot love you, it concerns not you whether ever I love Phaon or no. I do not ask the question for any further clearing of my knowledge Madam, (replied he) for I do not at all doubt it; but I ask it only, that I may once more in my life commend you, I beseech you Sir (replied Sapho) do not persist in a thing so unjust, and impertinent; but content your self, that I tell you, I cannot love you, and that I do not perceive in Phaon the same impossibility of loving him, as I do of you: That is enough Madam, (said he and rise up,) to make me the most miserable of men, yet since I am fully resolved to respect you for ever, I will not do what I am able to break down violently that wall which separates me from your affection: I will only wish in parting from you that you may hereafter know, though you have given your heart unto the most accomplished of all your Lovers, yet you have not given it unto the most faithfull, and most amorous.

After this Madam, Tysander, went away, but with so much sadness in his looks, that Sapho, as insensible as she was to him, did feel her heart was a little moved. But since there were then such things in agitation. as did move it much more, she thought more of Phaon, than Tysander, and she had a fresh subject for those thoughts, by a visit which my sister made unto her.

For be pleased to know Madam, hat I seeing Phaon in such a gulph of sorrows, and having my self a great desire to know truly whether these verses which had caused so much disorder, were made for Phaon, as I thought they were, I went unto Cydnon, with whom I lived; not only as with a most dear sister, but as with a most faithfull friend, and as a great secret, I told her of my friends jealousy; of Page 128 the adventure of the verses, and conjured her to tell me whether they were made for Phaon. If they were made for any one, replied she, certainly they were made for him: but Brother, I know nothing of them, nor did Sapho ever shew mee the verses you speak of. However (said I unto her) the poor Phaon who thinks they were made for some other, is so extremely jealous and sad, that I think he will dye, unless you help me to assist & comfort him. Truly brother (replied she) it is not an easie matter to be done, for Sapho who seldome keeps any secret from me, never mentioned this adventure: And I do not see how I can speak unto him unlesse he speak unto me: 'Tis true (added she) that I have hardly seen her two minutes since we were upon the Sea: But I will promise you to see Sapho, and do Phaon any good Office I can.

After this I did aggravate the jealousy of this Lover as much as I could, purposely to make them pity his misery: but the more I spoke, the more I saw shee had a mind to laugh; for she knowing all Sapho's thoughts of Phaon, she was so tickled to thinke that he himselfe should be the beloved Rivall which so much afflicted him, as for her heart she could not forbear. Cruell sister (said I unto her) I did not acquaint you with the miseries of my friend for you to laugh at them, I assure you he deserves more pity then laughter. If I thought so brother (replied she) I should not laugh: But since I know Phaon has no Rivall whom be need to fear, I must confesse I cannot choose but laugh at his ill-grounded sorrows: For it is as good sport as possible can be, to observe the follies of the wildest men, when they are once engaged in a businesse of this nature: And therefore I pray pardon this naturall disposition of mirth, when I meet with such occasions as this, and believe that I will do Phaon all the offices of a friend I can. And indeed Madam, as soon as she was gone, she went unto Sapho, and came thither about a quarter of an hour after Tysander went away: so as Sapho's mind being full, and desirous to unburthen it unto her sister, she called her into her Closet: and giving orders that none should come unto her, she conjured Cydnon to pardon her for with-holding a secret from her three dayes together; for truly my deare Cydnon (said Sapho unto her, after she had told her the adventure) never any thing in all my life did so cruelly vex me: and nothing was more intolerable to me, then that Tysander should see any verses of such a nature: nor nothing more terrible to me, than to think that Phaon should have read them.

For my part (continued she) I do not think I shall be able to see him: and I have seen none these three dayes, purposely to avoid meeting with him; not but that I sometimes wished it might be he who should find these verses; but I wished it when I thought he had them not: Yet now it is otherwise with me, and I had rather a hundred others had seen them then Phaon, for how dare I ever look him in the face after such a peevish adventure? The truth is, I have reason to fear, that his trusting unto the affection which I beare unto him, will now talk to him with lesse respect, and will think his Conquest so easie, that it is no glory unto him. If you have any cause of fears (replied Cydnon) it is not at any thing you have said: And to testifie how absolutely I am devoted yours, Madam, I will betray a secret unto you which a Brother hath entrusted mee withall. And acquaint you that Phaon is the most miserable, and the most jealous of all men living He is not then in Love with me (replied Sapho and blushed) he is more in Love with you (replied Cydnon) than ever any was: but he is so jealous, and in such a fantastical manner, as I know not how you can cure him. This Aenigma is so obscure, answered Sapho, that it passeth my understanding when I have expounded it (replied she) you will better understand it, but your astonishment will not be a jot the lesse: For on that day when you shewed Phaon and Democedes your verses, Phaon found in them such passionate expressions, as he concluded most certainly you either were in Love, or had been, and that it was impossible any living should write so tenderly, unlesse they had been in Love; so as this odd fancy being in his head, he hath since suffered most incredible afflictions, and hath done nothing else but hunt out after this supposed Rivall, who hath inspired you with such tendernes in your verses.

But I beseech you Cydnon (said Sapho and interrupted her) tell mee seriously whether all this you tell me be not some quibble of your own wit? No no, replied Page 127 she, there is nothing truer then what I tell you: For the miserable Phaon is so possessed with this imagination, that in lieu of applying them unto himselfe, or rejoicing at his good fortune, he is carefully examining what naues sutes best with that blank which was left in a verse: and for my part, I have such merry Conceptions upon this passage, that did I not see you very pensive, I should laugh heartily: However I beseech you seriously to find out some way how to cure poor Phaon of his jealousy; for my Brother represents him in such a miserable condition, that he deserves some help and succour. I perceive then (replied Sapho) that Democedes hath seen these cruell verses which make me so ashamed: And that though I have told Phaon a hundred times, if ever I admitted of any Lover, he should never have any Confident; yet I see that I am like to have as many Confidents of my weaknesse as there are men in Mytelene. Not but that I know very well (continued she very obligingly) Democedes is very discreet: but for all that Cydnon confesse the truth, did not he guesse at the name better then Phaon? He did not tell me (replied she) but I assured him that either these Verses were intended for none, or else that they were intended for Phaon. For he being his particular friend, I thought thereby the more to engage his discretion, and to keep him from further enquiry into a businesse of which I promised to give him an accompt.

But Cydnon (replied Sapho) what accompt can you give him which will be advantageous unto me? For to tell him that I love Phaon, is horrid unto me: To swear that I love him not, will make him believe I love another: and to protest that I love none (considering the fancy which Phaon hath in his head) will augment his jealousy and not justifie me: However I wish I could find out an expedient which would prevent his jealousy which would preserve his affection, which would hide mine from Democedes, and which would only let Phaon guesse at mine: For my part (replied Cydnon) considering the language of my brother, I think it will be a very hard matter to cure Phaon of his jealousy, unlesse you will acquaint him with your tendernes of him: Fye fye Cydnon (replied Sapho) I had rather he should continue eternally jealous, than that he should see all my weaknesse.

Then you care not for preserving his heart (answered Cydnon) for you know better than I do, that long jealousy smothers love. The foundation of Phaons jealousy hath so little solidity in it (replied Sapho) that I cannot thinke it will last long. Nay on the contrary (answered my sister) since it hath no foundation, it is harder to drive away: As for example, if Phaon were positively jealous of Nicanor, then there no way but to treat Nicanor ill, and see him no more, to make his jealousy cease: but since hee is jealous onely because you have written your verses in such tender and passionate straines as might persuade one a little that you are in love, it is impossible you should ever cure him; but by giving him some cause to think you have none but him, and to let him think that the verses he hath seen belongs to him. As I did guesse at his affection to me before he told me of it (answered shee) so let him guesse if he can at the tendernes I have to him: For if he do not, he shall never know it for me. But yet (said Cydnon) must he not know any thing more concerning that verse which wants a name? Is it not enough (replied she) that he says that the names of all others (who are in any likelihood of loving me) does not sute with it, and that his doth? Is not this enough to make him understand, that either they were made for none, or they were made for him?

If his fancy were not prepossessed (replied Cydnon) doubtless what you say were sufficient: but as the constitution of his mind is, if the conservation of Phaon be dear unto you, something else must be done, and you must permit my brother at the least to give him some comfort and hopes in his misery. Provided hee could doe it without giving any suspitions of my consent (replied Sapho) Democedes may tell him what he will to persuade him I am not in Love with any; for I had rather Phaon should think I love him, then to think I will permit any other to love me.

After this, Sapho told Cydnon all that Tysander said unto her: Thus you see (said she unto her) that Phaons Rivall is better informed of my sorrows for him, then Page 130 he himself is. The truth is Cydnon (continued she) my fate is very strange, for Tysander knows that I do love Phaon, and he knows it so certainly that he hath abandoned me upon it: And Phaon on the contrary is ready to quit me, because he thinks I love another and not him, so as being, (as if it were) a Rivall, unto himselfe, he doth himself more hurt then all his Rivalls, and hath brought in unto the most strange conjecture that ever a person of my humour could be. For women ought never to say that they are in Love, but only that they are loved. Therefore Cyd|non we must submit the adventure unto fortune. But take heed Madam, replied she, you do not repent of what you have said. If I do repent of what I have said (replied she) I shall not do any more then what I have done a thousand times since I first knew Phaon, for I have repented I ever desired Democedes to bring me acquainted with him, I repented that ever I spoke unto him, that ever I loved him, and that ever I composed those unhappy verses which caused this last disorder, and to tell you my thoughts plainly I repent of all I ever said or did since I was first taught to speak; And if I should keep Phaon by any endeavours which are unworthy of my self, I should repent eternally, and to tell you truly if I should lose him by my too scrupulous severity I should repent it till my death.

This Madam was the temper of Saphoes mind when my Sister talked with her, so as knowing very well that she would give her consent unto Phaons cure of jealousy; by any wayes which might not engage her too farre, she would presse her no further, and as soon as she saw me, she told me that Phaon was to blame, that I should advise him to see Sapho as soon as he could, and that most certainly he had no reason to feare any Rivalls. But Madam, the strangest passage in all this ren|counter was, that Saphos mind was taken up with so many various thoughts, that she never thought of any anger against Phaon, for being so bold as to take these verses out of her Closet.

However Cydnon transacted so well with me, and I with Phaon, that though he did not positively believe all I told him, yet he resolved to go unto Sapho, and to go with intentions of telling her the very bottom of his soule: yet in the interim, a chance happened which changed his mind.

For an universall report went about all Mytilene, that Tysander was resolved to see Sapho no more. Phaon imagining that the Prince would never have quite• her, unlesse he had discovered that she was in love with some one, his, jealousy renewed, and broke of his first design. Not but that he had reason to believe of Tysan|der as he did, but he did not know that it was himself who dis•engaged that Prince from the love of Sapho: But at last after he had passed over two dayes in this un|certainty, he resolved again to go unto Sapho, and discover unto her the• grandure of his Love, and the violency of his jealousy: and indeed he went unto her the next day so early, that he found none with her.

It is an easie matter to tell you Madam, the resentments of these two persons: For Sapho was ashamed of her own weaknesse and pittied the weaknesse of Phaon: and this Lover had so many severall resentments, as it is impossible to represent them, for he told me that his love and his jealousy re-doubled, and yet also he had some reviver of his hopes. But at last, having saluted each other with equall agitation of spirits, Phaon asked Sapho pardon for being so long from her. But Maldam, (said he) I know not, whether after I have asked pardon for not seeing you, I should also ask it for seeing you: For I am come with a resolution to talk of so many things, as that I am afraid of talking something which shall displease you, though I am resolved to say nothing that shall be unworthy of that love and re|spect which I have unto you.

Sir, replied she, we have had so few occasions of any quarrells since we were ac|quainted, that I know not what you can say otherwise. I must ask you Madam, replied he, whether I was not much to blame in being the most jealous man alive? I must conjure you to talk sincerely with me; I must beseech you to have compas|sion upon my weaknesse; To examine well the passion which caused it, to ponder all the reasons which may excuse my jealousy, and if it be possible, not to drive me unto despair.

All these, replied Sar•, do argue, that there is such a great disorder in your mind, as I should out of pity do that, which in reason I ought not to do, if I did Page 131 hearken unto the exact Rules of Just•ce and decency. And therefore I will harken unto your complaints, and let you speak of your jealousy though I cannot en|dure you should speak of your Love. Speak then Phaon, (said she againe unto him) and tell me of whom you are jealous? I know not Madam (said he unto her) but I am sure, that sometimes I think I have all imaginable causes. For Madam you have such passionate expressions in your writings, as you must of necessity have been sensible of them yourself. And you have made such verses which I was so bold as to steal away, as have cost me a million of sighs, and perhaps will cost me my life, if you of your goodnesse will nor apply a remedy to cure me: But what remedy (said Sapho) will cure you? you must perswade me (replied he) that you have loved none, and that if ever you love any it shall be the unfortunate Pha|on. But Madam, since this is an impossibility, I will not ask it, but will possitively ask you the true state of your soule, and will ask you the name of him for whom you made those verses which I was so presumptuous as totake out of your Closet.

To answer in generall unto all you ask, (replied she) I must tell you, that I did write so passionately, because naturally, I have a tender soule, and I assure you afterwards, that if I have made any jealous, yet certainly it ought not to have been you. For I will tell you for mine own honour, as much as for your tranquility, that I loved none, the same day you came unto Mytelene, and I assure you further, that I have done nothing since which should make you jealous: And to tel|stifie the truth of what I say, I will give you leave to observe all my actions, all my words, and all my very looks, and if after that you find any cause of jealousy, then be so, even unto furie; and be perswaded that in permitting you to be jealous I have done more for you, then ever I did for any.

Since Madam, you cannot permit me to be jealous (replied he) unlesse you per|mit me to be in love, I must give you most humble thanks for that permission, as for the greatest favour in the world; yet I should be much more obliged, if you would be pleased to tell me whom you are pleased I should love, then to give me leave to be jealous? And therefore, tell me Madam, I beseech you, whether I may hope, that you will ever be so tender unto me as you know most admirably well how to expresse? should I not be too presumptuous in pretending unto those verses which so cruelly have made me jealous? But Madam, before I can believe such a glorious assurance, you must be very sincere: you must tell me more then what yet you have; you must shew me your heart, as I have shewed you mine; and you must not keep back any secret of your soule, before I can know you. Though you have loved one before I had the honour to be known unto you, yet I have no reason to complaine: Not but that I wish with a most passionate desire, that I were the first who entred into your heart: but yet if that happinesse be not possible however I shall esteem my self very happy in being the successour of that most happy Rivall.

Speak then, Divine Sapho, and tell me whether I must be jealous? whether I must be happy? or whether I must be miserable? and to tell me in two fatal words, whether must live or dye? Phaon expressed himself in an Aire so full of reverent respect, he had in his voice such a kind of Rethorically tone; and hee looked upon Sapho in such a submissee and passionate manner, that this faire one not being able treat such a Lover ill whom she had a mind to preserve, she spoke unto him so discreetly that without telling him she loved him, she did re-animate his hopes, did dissipate his jealousy, augment his passion, and fill his soule full of joy.

Indeed these two Lovers, who in beginning their discourse knew hardly what to say, and who had a thousand thoughts in in their hearts which they thought should never be revealed, yet at last imparted all, and made such a sincere exchange of all their most secret thoughts, that all in the heart of Sapho, passed into the soule of Phaon, and all that was in the soule of Phaon passed into the soule of Sapho. Allso they agreed upon the Articles and Conditions of their Love. For Phaon pro|mised Sapho which desired it, never to desire any thing of her, but the enjoyment and possession of her heart: And she promised him also, never to receive any unto her heart, but him.

After this, they told each other all the particular passages of their Lives. And Page 132 ever since Madam, there hath been such an admirable union between these two persons as never were their equals seen; the love of Phaon augmented with his happiness, and the affection of Sapho became more violent, by the acquaintance she had of the greatness of her Lovers Love. Never were two hearts seen more united; nor ever did Love joyn two together, with more purity and zeale.

They communicated unto each other all their thoughts, and they understood one another without telling them; they saw in each others eyes, the motions of of their hearts, and saw them all so tender and passionate unto each other, that the more they looked, the more they loved: yet the peace between them was not so solidly established but they had some amorous wars, and though they loved as much possible, yet they would sometimes complain that they loved not enough; but there was never any such civill wars as did disturb the Halcyon Serenity of their Loves.

In the mean time, ever since this conjunction of hearts between Phaon and Sapho, Nicanor hath been in a miserable condition, and Tysander esteemed himself as hap|py as prudent, in dis-engaging himself from his passion. The truth is, he cured himself by another beauty; for Pittacus being resolved to marry him unto the fait Alcioneide, he went to Gnides, where she was, and where he fell as much in love with her as with Sapho, but for his love to the one, he still preserved much esteem for the other.

In the mean time, Charaxes the brother of Sapho, who took it ill she should re|fuse the affection of Tysander, and admit of Phaons, went to travell, and departed without taking his leave, or bidding adieu to any. On the other side, though Nicanor did still most passionately love Sapho, and horribly hated Phaon, yet he offered no violence unto either: For such was the admirable discretion of Sapho, in keeping every one within the limits of their due respects, and in uniting the most di|vided spirits, that though she could not make them perfect friends, yet she kept them from down right quarrelling. All this while Phaon being assured, that he was preferred before all his Rivalls, he was not jealous of any: And indeed he was highly happy in it; for Sapho caused so many to be in love with her, that Alces himself, as deeply in love as he was with the fair Athys, began to waver and divide his heart: And except Themistogenes, who could not love any which did not resemble Damophile, there was not one man of any soul or quality, who had not some sparks of Love unto Sapho.

For my part, being Phaons choice, and particular friend, I ever defended my self against her Arrows, and was never down right in love with her, but I had so much affection unto her, as kept me from loving any other.

In the mean time, this universall approbation of Sapho, incensed all the Ladies who pretending unto high beauty, had hardly any adorers, whilst Sapho, whose modesty would not let her think she had any, was invironed with a croud of them. But the wonder was, that this most rare woman, without the least digression from that fidelity she owed unto Phaon, did still maintain her sovereignty in the souls of all her Lovers: For behaving her self so discreetly, that none of them ever said any thing unto her, which she would not have them, she never had any cause to complain against them, and by consequence had no cause to banish them from her: Not but that Phaon would some days complain a little against such a croud about her, but when she gave him to understand; that prudence required he should hide himself among the croud, because if she should banish them, she should banish him also, or else her glory would suffer diminution, then Phaon was contented to endure all the Lovers of Sapho, who durst not appear under any other notion than that of friends.

For my part, I have wondred a hundred times at that power, which Sapho had over her slaves: For though there was not one of them, who did not know that she loved Phaon, and Phaon only, yet there was not one of them who was out of hopes, though she gave them not the least ground: And though they all hated Phaon, yet they neither durst, nor could hurt him: Nor did they jar among themselves, for since they could be jealous of none but Phaon only, they grew into a kind of confidence together.

Thus, the Loved, the Lovers, the Lover loved, and the ill treated Rivalls, all were together, without the least contest that was troublesome unto our soci|ety; Page 133 and which was most admirable, Sapho in the midst of this croud, did find out waies to give Phaon a thousand testimonies of her affection to him, and unpercei|ved to sacrifice all his Rivalls unto him. Thus, without doing any thing against the exact rules of civility, and without any allurements, Sapho had the glory to have an infinite number of adorers, and without any of that severity of those faithful Lovers, who constrain themselves so much, that they almost become savage, Pha|on and she enjoyed all the sweets of a most pure and innocent Love; for they were none of those who as soon as they are certain of their mistresses, and servants, do use to renounce almost all manner of Gallantry, as if they had been married many a year, for Phaon was as Courtly as humble, and assiduous, as if he had yet to con|quer that noble heart which he already enjoyed: And Sapho was as exact, and as regularly civill and complaisant, as if her conquest were uncertain. Moreover, Feasts, Pleasures, and Joies, did inseparably follow them: And though they were most assured of each others esteem, yet they did strive with all imaginable cares to preserve it.

This Madam, was the life which Phaon and Sapho lived, whilst they were happy: yet as the Empire of Love is as subject unto great revolutions, as others are; so this calme, and silken peace, which was in the heart of Sapho, was not perpetuall, though it seemed as if it would be eternall For most certain it is, that never Lover had a more perfect heart of expressing much love, then Phaon had, he never saw any in Mytelene, but Sapho: And indeed it may almost be said, that he did scarcely see those who were friends unto his Mistress, though he was continually with her, for his eyes and mind were so wholly fixed upon the admired Sapho, as she could not doubt, but that she was the only soul of his thoughts, wheresoever he was. And since there is nothing more obliging, than to make a difference of a person in the midst of a great company, he knew so well how to oblige Sapho this way when any occasions were offered, as I never in my life, saw his like. Moreover, when he was with her, he seemed so happy, so contented, and so sensible of the least of her favours, as shee having absolutely the most tender soul in the world, did think there was nothing desirable which was not in her Lover: She was infinitely charmed with the delicacy of his wit; he had sometimes a certain kind of sweet and melancholly blithness, (if I may so call it) which furnished him with such diverting conceits, as that they cannot be repeated without derogation.

Moreover, being naturally curious and inquisitive, they had alwaies some amorous wrangle or other which made their discourse more sweet: For sometimes Phaon would needs know why she blushed, sometimes why she mused; and his excessive curiosity went so far that one day, there hapned a tender amorous dispute between them, because Phaon asked Sapho, why she was more sweet unto him that day than any other? afflicting himself as much, because she would not tell him, as if she had treated him ill. But Sir, (said she, having no mind to satifie his obstinate curiosity) sometimes you ask me such trivial questions, with so much good earnestness, that I must needs ask you in my turne, what is the cause of this generall curiosity, which causeth us so many petty quarrells? I should not think strange at your curiosity in things essentiall, and of concernment, but your humour is such, that you are inquisitive of every trifle: Yes Madam (said he unto her) I am so, and ever shall be, of every thing that concerns you, and if I could, I would oblige you to give me an account of all your thoughts, and of all your looks, for Madam, as you have given extream straight limits unto my desires, and as you have permitted me to aspire no further, than the enjoyment and possession of your heart: how can you think I should be assured of it, if I did not know all the passages in it? and therefore think not strange, I cannot endure you should deny me what I ask; for by acquainting me sometimes why you blush'd, why you studied, & why you did not look upon me: you put me into possession of that heart which you have promised me, and you joy me beyond my expressions: And indeed I set a greater value upon one of those little hidden thoughts, which obligingly discover your heart unto me than some would of greater favours who are not capable of all the nice delicacies of Love, therefore Madam I beseech you deny no more, the satisfaction of my curiosity though it ask only trifles of you, and trifles, which seem unto you unreasonable.

For indeed Madam, (added he, and smiled) Love is a Child, which delights himself in toys, and has innocent fatasmes, so that looking upon my too much curiosity Page 134 is an effect of the grandure of my love, I hope you will comply with my weakness, and rather then afflict me by telling me nothing, you will tell me all I shall aske.

You may judg Madam, after this, that the Love of Phaon was very tender, ingenuous, and gallant: and that loving one who knew the best in the world how to love, and who had a superlative witt, you may imagine they enjoyed a thousand delights, which those of a dull and grosse capacity in matters of Love, are ignorant of: Yet sometimes when Phaon considered that Sapho would not marry, and that she was the most vertuous woman in the world, he would be something pensive upon the matter: but she knew so well how to dissipate those muddy mist of melancholly, the cause of which she quickly discovered, as he was forced to confesse that he was the happiest Lover alive.

In the mean time, as I told you before, Nicanor being still in love with Sapho, and Alces wanted but little of it, Jealousie did so seize upon the heart of the faire Athys, and of Nicanor, that in the end it much molested the felicity of these most happy Lovers.

And the better to let you understand the cause of this alteration, I must acquaint you with a kind of a Feast which Sapho made at a house of hers some hundred furlongs from Mytelene, and which without dispute was the most pleasant leat in the Isle: And indeed, all that was desirable in a Country house was there to be found; for it was close by the Sea, and yet was full of the most rare fresh Springs and Fountains that ever were seen. Moreover, it had severall lovely Groves, Meadows, Gardens, and Grotto's: The structure also was very stately, so as every Summer Sapho went with Cynegire unto it, and all their friends came to visite them.

We being all there in that delightfull season, which may be termed the youth of the yeare; and when the first greenness of the hearbs and leaves renders the Country most pleasing, Sapho with Cynegire invited all her deare friends, to pass away a whole day with them. But though she invited only friends, yet others also came: For Nicanor, Alces, Phaon, and I waited upon Amithone, Athys, Erinne, and Cydnon: And Chance so ordered it, that the very same day Philyre with her two friends and two Adorers of Sapho came thither in the afternoon, not knowing that we were there, so as the company were very frolick that day.

I shall not relate unto you Madam the particulars of this Feast: only tell you, that though Sapho and her Cousin were dressed only in white, decked with flow'ers, yet were they so gallant, that a prettier sight could not be seen.

When we came to Sapho's house, she met us with two of her women in a little thick Grove, in the midst of which is a most admirable Spring, running by the foot of a huge Tree, whose branches were so large and thick, that they did not only over-shadow the Fountain, but many seats of Grasse also which were about it. Sapho meeting us in this place in such a dresse as I mentioned, she received us with such a gallant Aire, and in so noble a Garbe, that in my life I never saw her so lovely: For she had the fragrancy of the whole Spring in her face, her eyes had the lustre of the rising Sun, when first it appears without a Cloud: and her joys which she expressed at the sight of us, did so visibly glance it selfe upon us by her lovely looks, as presaged a very pleasing passing away of that day: There was not one in all the company upon whom she bestowed not a very obliging Complement, and who did not thinke that shee was sweeter unto them then unto others.

But I, who always had an observant eye upon her, was not so much mistaken as they were; for in the very midst of this tumultuous joy which she expressed at the sight of us, I saw in her faire eyes something so singular towards Phaon when she made her Complement to him, that those advantageous thoughts which her heart harboured of him were very apparant unto my eye. However, all this jolly company desiring to stay a while in that place, our Coaches went behind the Grove unto Sapho's house, and we stayed to enjoy the delight of that pleasing shade, the agreeable murmur of the Fountain, and pleasant noise of the leaves which an easie gale of winde did whifle.

This first conversation was something miscellaneous, and passed from object Page 135 to object: At the first, those Ladies which came from Mytelene, began to commend the beauty of Sapho, and admired how she kept her selfe from being Sunburnt: Considering that as long as she was in the Country, she was perpetually abroad. Sapho on her side, she gave them such sweet adulatory Language, as custome hath introduced amongst such Ladies as know the World, and are both young and faire.

After she had asked us all the newes of Mytilene, We in our turns asked her all the passages of her solitude; Cydnon chid her for not writing unto her, Erinne for not remembering her, Athys for going avay without bidding her Adieu; and all of us together told her that she affected solitude so much, and her absence was such an affliction to us, that we could not any longer endure it, To prove that what you say is true (replyed Sapho very sweetly) you must acquaint me how you have spent your time this eight days since I came hither: For if you can make it appeare that you do really regret my absence, I believe I shall return with you: but to tell you truly, I am perswaded that you were all full of diversions, notwithstanding my absence. For my part (said Nicanor) I went no whither but unto Pittacus about businesse of much importance, concerning a friend of mine: And the faire Athys knows very well, that though I am her neer Neighbour, yet I never saw her; it is very true indeed (replyed she) Nicanor hath been very solitary since your departure: And for my particular (added she very craftily) I have not been so, for I have seen much company, and walked abroad very often, but for all that I was extream weary of your absence, and wished for you a hundred and a hundred times: I am sure Phaon who was with me twice when I walked to take the Aire, does know that I expressed as much, and that I chid him for being no sadder then he was at your absence.

I must confesse (replyed Phaon) that yesterday you chid me, but it was unjustly. For those joyes which then appeared in my eyes, were only caused because I was to come hither this day. You have very cunningly recovered your selfe out of that net which the faire Athys unawares had like to have entangled you in (replyed Alces) but I know not whether you can so well get out of that which I shall put you into, when I shall tell you that the very next morning after Sapho departed, we made five or sixe visits together, and you were not at all discontented. Sapho, replyed hee, hath so well taught mee to be civill, that I had rather visite none, then say nothing to them: Yet Cydnon whom I saw some 2 or 3 days after, can tell you, that she saw me very melancholly. 'Tis true (replyed Amithone) but I know not whether it was at the absence of Sapho, for you were very merry the day before, and was at play, and lost much. Since the faire Sapho knows very well (replyed he) that I have no covetous soule, I do not feare she will suspect me for being more sadde for what I lost at play, then for the losse of her sight.

However it be (said she, and both blusht and smiled) I perceive that you had no time to be much discontented; for you have frequented walks, you have made visits, you have been at play, and doubtlesse have kept your Court with Pittacus, therefore being your friend, I must rejoyce you have spent your time so well, but I have little reason to thank you for thinking so little of me. Oh Madam (said he unto her) condemn me not before you heare me: I shall heare you another time (replyed she) as for this day, let us, after your example, think upon nothing but jocundry.

Sapho spoke this with so free an Aire, that Phaon was not troubled at it: And indeed, though at the first she thought that Phaon was not much troubled at her absence, yet since she received every day a Letter from him since she came into the Country, she conceived that he did it rather out of prudence then any defect of Love, so as this was no hinderance to her from being very merry all the rest of the day.

But after this good company had rested themselves a while, & after I had given Sapho an accompt of what I had done during her absence, she carried us through this pleasant grove unto a garden door which opened into a long walk, which led us unto the porch of the house where Cynegire received us. I shall not make any relation of the furniture in this house, nor of the neatnesse of our Repast, or of the Aromaticke smels which perfumed the rooms, for I will not insist upon such Page 136 trifvials: But give me leave to tell you, that an howre after we were risen from the Table, and were removed into a very pleasant withdrawing Room, next the dining Chamber, Philyre and her Company arrived: So as this encrease of good Company, augmented the joyes of Sapho; and she behaved her self so nobly unto all in the house, that Phaon being charmed at the sight of her, and not being Master of his passion, he expressed his admiration so openly, that Sapho made a signe unto him, to shut up his wonder in his heart, for he applauded her with such aggravations, he approached her with such earnestnesse, and looked upon her with so much love, that indeed there was some cause to think (considering his joyes in seeing her) that if he had been out of her sight he would have run mad.

In the meane time, a little after Philyre was come, and had presented all her company unto Sapho; This most admirable Lady told them all that she would shew them a place more pleasant then that they were in. And indeed, Cynegere and she carried us through a long close walk in a wood, which appeared so wild and so farre from any habitation, as one would have thought it a desert: And at the end of the thickest part of this wood, there was a great Grotto, which nature had begun, and which Art and Saphoes ingenuity had finished; And which indeed is one of the most delightfull things in the world. For it was large, it was coole, it was deep, and yet it was light enough; The Rock, had rarity of all Colours, and that which was added unto it, was such an excellent imitation of Nature, as one would think, Art had no hand in it.

Seats were contrived round about this Grott, and in such a rustique manner as if chance only had been the Contriver, yet were they very easie and handsome, for by a singular artifice one is made believe that the mosse which growes there, are Cushions: The little Purling Rivolet which runs through it, by its coolnesse, renders the place more delectable.

Besides all this, there were severall openings into a second Grott invisible to this other, through which such Voco-ducs were placed, as one might easily heare what one said unto another.

The place being thus pleasant, Cynegire and Sapho conducted us thither, we were no sooner set, but upon a sudden we heard a most admirable harmony, which came from the second Grott into that in which we were, and which filled it with such Seraphique Aires, as never was a more charming surprise. At first, we thought it was Sapho who appointed this diversion, but she was so astonished also that we quickly perceived it was not she.

In the mean time, all the Company looked upon Sapho, and she looked upon all the company, but to tell you truly, she no sooner looked upon Phaon, but she knew it to be a piece of his gallantry. He yet would not openly acknowledge it, but it passed for a piece of enchantment all the day, and furnished the Conversation with a very pleasant Subject. But Cyngire being most curious of all the Company, she went out of that Grott with one of the Ladies which came with Phylire, intending to go into the other Grott, and know from the mouths of the Musicians, who sent them, after which, she walked in a solitary Alley not far off. In the meane time, this gallantry of Phaons, caused every one to extoll it, and him both, though he said still, that he did not merit any such applause, and that his Gallantry came short of such an entertainment. Phaon (said my Sister unto him) if we should believe you, you were notably trapped; for those who really have gallant soules, do know they have such, and take it ill any should think they have not, and indeed they have reason to insist upon such qualities as makes them prized above others.

One must have gallant inclinations, (replied Alces and smiled) that can speak as you do, one ought to have Rationall inclinations as well as gallant (replied she) for it men do things no otherwise then as I intend they will never please very well. For my part, (replied Amithone) I would very gladly know, in what, this kind of Gallantry consists of which Cydon speaks: For my particular, (said Phaon and interrupted her) I had much rather we should talk of this then any thing else, for I must confesse, I meet with so many scurvy Gallants in this world, who yet do make great progresse in the hearts of some Ladies, that true, and really noble Gallants, make not so many conquests as they do. And therefore I would have Page 137 us begin here a description of bad Gallantry, to the end, that at our returne un|to Mytelene, we may infuse our Maxims into the minds of all the Town.

Then it is also requisite (replied Phylire) that you give Lawes and Rules unto the noble kind of Gallantry: for it will signifie nothing if you should only blame the one, and not teach us the other.

For my part (replied Sapho) I am such a professed enemy unto all bad gallants, though I do love a gallant Aire in all things, and should be ravished with such conversation if it were not in this place; but to tell you truly, (added she and smiled I would not it said in Mytelene, that we assembled here, to make Lawes for Love.

For my part, (replied Phaon) I will talk of nothing else this day. And for my particular (said I) I believe I cannot speak of any other subject. It is indeed so pleasing) (replied Nicanor) that it would be difficult to change it into a better. It is also so necessary (said Alces) that I know not what we should talk of, if not of this.

We talked of all the news before Dinner, (replied Phaon) we commended the beauty of the place, and we have talked almost of every thing, so as we shall have nothing to do (said Phaon unto Sapho) unlesse you will let us eyther commend you, or let us talk of Gallantry. Believe me (replied she) I had rather you should talk of Gallantry, then commend me. Then Madam, replied Phaon, I beseech you give us leave to talk of it all the day, for as my soule is now dispos'd, I think my self almost as witty as you are when you are out of your good humour. If you be no more (replied she) you would be lesse gallant then you are. But I beseech you (said the faire Athys unto Supho) tell us how you came to be the most gallant per|son in the world. I do not intend to accuse you of any Gallantrie (continued she craftily) when I say so, but to commend you because you neither do, nor say any thing but with a gallant Aire: Though I have not so much vanity as to believe this you say is applicative unto me, (replied Sapho) yet I do think, I know your meaning, and that there is a kind of gallantry without any love, which is sometimes to be used in most serious matters; and which gives an excellent charme un|to all that one does, or sayes.

In the meane time, this gallant Aire I meane does not altogether consist in much wit, much judgement, and much knowledge, but is a thing so particular, and so difficult to be acquired when one hath it not, that one knows not how to learne it, or where to seek it. For I know a man whom all the Court knows, who is very handsome, hath wit enough, who is very magnificent in his attendance, in his house and in his habit, who is able and speaks well, who hath done all that e|ver he can to get a gallant Aire, and who is for all that, the least gallant of all men living. But pray you (said Amithone) what is this gallant Aire which is so pleasing? It is I know not what (replied Sapho) which is compounded of a hundred severall things: It is a work of Nature infused into the Persons who have it; moreover, much comerce with the World and Court doth help, the Conversation of wo|men also, doth much contribute: And I dare maintaine, that never any had an Aire of gallantry, who shunned discourse with persons of my own sex; and if I durst, I would say, that before a man can attaine unto this gallant Aire, he must once in his life have some small inclination unto Love: But take heed, (replied Almithone) that you do not engage your self to l|ove by speaking as you do, for if it be necessary to have been in love before they can attaine this Aire of gallantry, it must follow by necessary inference, that a Lady who hath this gallant Aire hath loved some or other. No, replied Sapho, for though I do maintaine that a man must have h|is heart a little engaged before he can attaine this Aire, yet I maintaine also, that for a Lady to acquire it, it is sufficient if she receive a favourable disposition unto it, from Nature, that she hath seen the World, that she be acquainted with men of parts, and that she have a designe to please all in generall without lo|ving any in particular. For all that, me, thinks (said the faire Athys) that the word Gallant is too much abused: for I like it well that one should say this is gallantly thought: or this is gallantly said▪ and a thousand such like, whose wit▪ beares a part in it; but it is not so to say, this habit is very gallant, or that man is very gallantly drest.

Page 138 For my part (said Phaon) I make no such difficulty of it, for it is that gallant air which Sapho, hath in her minde, and in all her person, that makes the dresse she weares become her so well; and to prove the truth, one shall see some Ladies at a Ball, who are rarely drest, and who yet are but ugly in comparison of that simple dresse which hath its gallantry from the Person who weares it.

For my particular, (added Sapho) I think one may put a gallant Aire upon all, and that any may keep it as long as they live; but to tell you truly, and to speak in generall, this kind of gallantry is the work of another, and must either be in love, or have a naturall desire to please before it can be gotten. Not but that as I said before, there are some persons of great rank and quality, who cannot have it, for they want that naturall Mould, which puts I know not what kind of spirit, which pleaseth unto things least capable, and infuseth into the most common talk a secret charm which satisfieth, and diverteth: There is I say, I know not what kind of gallant spirit infused into the person which possesseth it, both in his Wit, in his Speech, his Action, and in his Habit: This is it which doth accomplish men, which renders them amiable, and which makes them loved.

Indeed, there is a kind of Byas or faculty in telling of things, which sets a value upon them, and those who have this faculty, may oftentimes speak of that, which others dare not so much as think, but in my opinion, the gallant Air in conversat|ion, consists principally, in speaking of things in an easie and naturall manner: To incline unto more sweetness, and mirth, then unto the serious and sharp, to speak easily, and in apt terms without affectation, there must be also a kind of insinuating and flattering spirit, to subdue the minds of others, and if I could ex|press my meaning well, I would confess unto you, that one cannot be compleatly amiable without this gallant Air.

Tis true, said Alces, that it is difficult to please without it; but yet it must be confessed, that those unto whom it is absolutely necessary, are those who make pro|fession of gallantry.

It is most certain (replied Sapho) that a Lover without this air of gallantry, is a most pittifull thing. And the worst is (continued he) there are an infinite num|ber of young men who are but newly stept into the world, which beleive all gallantry to consist in the most fantastick mode, which some fond foolish Taylor in|vented, and in being bold and talking much: In going unto all houses whose gates are open, having no business there but to talk of trifles, without either Gallantry, Passion, or Wit.

There are some (replied Cydon) who think themselves very gallant men, if they can but say, they have seen all the gallant women in the town, and brag, that I was yesterday with such a one, and the day before with that Lady: I presented a third with a Serenade, I treated Sapho, and all her company with a banquet, I was with another troop of Ladies the day following, and so of the rest.

These sort which you mention (replied Sapho,) are not in the number of good Gallans for certainly they are very shallow witted, and full of folly; but I am much more afraid of those eternall languishors, who are alwaies telling smooth tales, who are deeply in love with the gray, the black, the brown eyes, with equal fervency: who think they are hugely dishonored, if they have been an houre with a woman, and not sighed: For my part I cannot endure them, and I am confident, they say nothing unto him which they had not said a thousand times unto others, so as I am not able, either to hearken unto them, or to return an answer. I must con|fess replied Phaon, these universal sighers are a sort of strange men but we do know some brisk and fiery Lovers, which are no more than they, and all the company knows one, who is in love with a great beauty, who swears all the oathes under heaven, that he loves her more than ever any did or can, that he will dye a hundred deaths to do her service, that he will kill all those who dare displease her, and would take it for a great favour if she will bid him go, and kill any man for her service.

This man is so brutish, (replied Erinne) that he deserves not to be spoke unto; but I would gladly know, what one should think of certain merry gallants, who never talk of Love but in rallery, and yet are alwaies talking of it, who being nei|ther busibodies nor Lovers, are continually walking from place to place, to vent their jocund gallantry, without any other design.

Page 139 These greggs seldome stay long in a place, nor do they much trouble me when I meet with them, for some of them divert me; but those who most anger me, are such reall busi-bodies as have ten or twelve severall intrigues and plots, without a dram of Love in any of them, who have a hundred severall businesses, and yet not one.

I assure you (replied Phylire) those obstinate Lovers who are alwaies melan|cholly, are never pleasing to me nor themselves; and I know one who is always so sadly sober, that I think him jealous, or that he is thinking of killing his Rivall, or poysoning himself. Doubtless there are some such gloomy Lovers, (replied Phaon) who are as displeasing as you think them: But amiable Phylire, there may be some faithfull Lovers as sad, who yet are not so troublesome. This is most constantly true (replied Cydon) that there are very few men who are deeply in love, and very gallant, and who are less pleasing unto others, than they are unto those they love: And though love seems to be but a trifle, yet it is the rarest thing in the world, to find a Lover who can trifle it handsomly. But yet (said I, and ad|dressed my speech unto Sapho) it is not just to examine only the gallants, but it is better to talk of gallantry in generall, to the end that the gallantry of Ladies in particular, may also be talked of.

I assure you (replied Sapho) there are some who are gross in their gallantry, that it would be both a favour and an honour unto them, not to talk of it. Yet I must needs confess, that women are to be blamed for the ill gallantry of men; for if they did but know how to make use of those priviledges▪ which belong unto their sex, they would make men right gallants, and would never suffer them to fail in their due respects: Indeed, they would never suffer a hundred uncivill familiarities, which most new gallants would bring into the world, for there is a great intervall between a constrained Ceremony and incivility; and if all gallant Ladies did but well understand of the mystery of behaving themselves, their gallants would be more respective, and more complaisant, and by consequence more pleasing. But the worst is, those women who have taken a crochet of gallantry into their heads, do imagine, that unless they be indulgent unto their gallants, they cannot keep them, and all those I speak of do neither care for their own reputation, nor for the advantage of their own gallantry, but only how to take off a Lover from this Lady, to attract this gallant, to preserve another, and to engage a thousand if they could: There are some also (continued she) which do worse, and who keep a hundred private correspondencies •n lieu of one.

Tis true, (replied Amithone) I know some women whose gallantry is a very horror unto any of any virtue, and behave themselves so impudently, as it may truly be said, that they make it their glory, which should be their shame; but I am sure their Gallants themselves do scorn them, and as they behave themselves, they will never have any who will esteem them, for men will not hazard their reputat|ions for them. Yet we use to see many men (replied Erinne) who never care for the reputation of those Ladyes they love; since they care not for their own (replied Cydon) I know not how they should care for others. But I beseech you (said Nicanor) is it impossible you should find nothing to say of gallants, and gallantry, but what is ill? I assure you (replied Sapho) it is much easier to speak ill then good of them, considering what a great number of men there are, which will be meddling with things they understand not; yet certain it is, that if Ladies in generall, did but know how to manage, it would be possible, to bring into the world such a sprightly, pleasant, and innocent gallantry, as should never be offen|sive, neither unto prudence nor virtue. Indeed, if Ladies would not value their Lovers, but according to their merits, and not according to their flatteries and fa|vours, the conquest of their hearts being more difficult, then men would be more complaisant, more obsequious, more humble, and more respective then they are; women would be also less interested, less cheaters, less simple, and less dishonored than they are. So as every one being in their right Sphere, Mistresses Mistresses, and Servants Servants; delights would abound in the world, Politeness would flourish, and true gallantry would be seen in its right colours, then should we never as now we do, hear men talk of women in general with much scorn, nor should we hear them brag publicly of their favours. Then we should not see any women cast Page 140 off all modesty and shame, though they be the charms of right gallantry; we should never see Ladies quarrelling about a Lover, nor out of mercenary thoughts, sell their hearts as if they were Diamonds: For indeed, if gallantry be at any time allowable it must be, when the gallant cannot be upbraided with anything, but this, that they could not choose but love another, better than themselves.

As Sapho said so, Cynegire, and the Lady who was walking with her, being returned, the discourse was interrupted, and an humour of walking coming into the general fancy, all the company went out of the Grotto, and went to walk in a shady, long, and large Arbour, and the musick following, the spirit of dancing came on them for an hour, which was performed most excellently.

In the mean time, though it was not likely that Phaon could find any opportunity of privacy with Sapho, at a time when she had so many Complements to perform unto so many several persons as did her the honour of this visit, yet he met with an occasion; for as every one had an occasion to walk a little after their dancing, so he presented his hand unto Sapho: And by this means, going more softly than the rest, they did insensibly separate themselves some eight or ten paces from all the company, and talked unto her of his passion, and in such vehement raptures, that Sapho, as difficult as it was to please her in matter of tenderness, was well satisfied with him that day. Indeed, he told her so directly all that she thought he would tell her, and that in such an obliging manner, that she thought him worthy to shew him her Joyes which she had in his loving her, and yet she chid him for being so pleasant in her absence: but he answered so well, that she did not think his jocundry proceeded from his inclinations: and indeed he was so extremely joyed at the sight of her, as she could not imagine but he would grieve for her absence: but as sweet as Phaons company was unto her, she left it, and went unto the rest of the company, who were so well pleased with the place, that they could not part from it until the evening after Supper. Sapho kept Cydnon with her, and the rest promised to write unto her: so that after we were gone, these two Ladies talked a long time together. But on Sapho's side more sadly, because she could not well brook the absence of Phaon, yet was it so sweet a kind of sadness, and did not deject her, nor hinder her from a most excellent discourse unto my sister upon the tenderness of Love.

The truth is, my deare Cydnon (said she unto her) Love is a most phantastical passion: For though one doth wish nothing more zealously than the happiness of the person they love, yet I should at this time be extremely sorry if Phaon should not as much grieve at his being out of my sight, as I do for being out of his: and sometimes I am so vexed when he is absent from me, that I cannot tell what he does, and what he thinks, that it makes me almost as sad as if I knew certainly that he never thought upon me at all, yet perhaps he entertains such thoughts as would even ravish me with joy if I could know them, and find in Phaons heart such as are in my own.

But Madam, whilst Sapho was thus talking with my Sister, all our company were returned unto Mytelene, and returned with such a spirit of joy as I am not able to expresse, except Nicanor, who was not able to frolic it like the rest, because he was out of hopes of Sapho's love. Perhaps Madam, you will think I was mistaken when I excepted only Nicanor, and that I should have excepted Phaon: But Madam, I must acquaint you how he had such a Fancy as I think never any Lover besides himselfe had: For Phaon, though he had a most tender and passionate soule, and did love with an inconceivable zeale, yet was his soule seldome sensible of any sorrow; and absence, as harsh as it is unto all other Lovers, seldome much troubled him, though he was as much joyed to be with her he loved, as one knows how to imagine: Indeed I have seen him sometimes with Sapho in such raptures of delight, as were very neare an extasie, and I have seen him absent from her without any excessive sorrow: Not but that hee loved her both present and absent, more then ever any was able to expresse: but the reason was, because his soule was more sensible of joy then sorrow; and because as soone as he had lost his greatest delight, he would seek out lesse to comfort himselfe.

Indeed his soule was so addicted to follow all that could please him, and to shun any thing that would make him melancholly, as hee was sometimes able to Page 144 be absent from her he loved most, without being very miserable. Yet this did not hinder, but when he saw the person he loved again, he would think himselfe as happy as if he had never been afflicted: such joyes would sparkle in his eyes, and such an unexpressable spirit would spread it selfe over all his Countenance, as sufficiently testified the satisfaction he had in seeing her whom he adored: so as one could not imagine that a man who could enjoy a happiness with such high delight, could part from it without abundance of sorrow.

Sapho also is excusable for being so long ignorant, that Phaon tasted only the sweets of Love, without the bitters, for shee saw him so transported with joyes when he was with her, that she might easily imagine him full of sadness when he was from her: For my part, I thought at first, that he did it only out of prudence, the better to hide his love unto Sapho, and that his frolic humour all the way as we returned to Mytelene, was only to blind the company.

In the mean time, the jolly humour of Phaon encreased the sullen humour of Nicanor, he thought that that mirth of his Rivall proceeded from the obliging behaviour of Sapho, and therefore he could not hide his joyes. As for Athys, her jealousy begetting in her fancy a desire to disquiet Sapho, she remembered the discourse which Sapho and the company had concerning Sapho's diversions during his absence: so as negotiating the businesse with as much wit as malice, she sent two dayes after her return, a servant unto Sapho, with a Letter which I needs must acquaint you with, for if I be not much mistaken in it, it was in these Terms.

ATHYS unto SAPHO.

MADAM,

Since I cannot forget my promise of writing unto you all the newes, I am desirous to acquit my selfe: But since Mytelene affords little, I must acquaint you with our Journey, which was no lesse diverting in our return, then in our coming to you; for Phaon and Alces were in the blithest humours in the world: and except Nicanor who was very melancholly, all the rest of the company thought the way very short. Truth is, Phaon and Alces were so full of their Jollities, that I should fill my Letter full of mirth, and swell it into a volume if I should write them all: But since I think it not good to divert you too much in the Countrey, lest it should keepe you too long from satisfying the wishes of your friends by your presence, I will not mention them: Also I am forced to finish my Letter, because I have promised to divert my selfe in walking with Phaon and Alces, and they do stay for me: I saw so much blithenesse in their faces this morning at the Temple, that I have reason to believe they will be in a very pleasant humour; but for my part, I assure you, I shall take delight in nothing more then in seeing you againe.

ATHYS.

This Madam, was the Letter of Athys, which doubtles contained in it all imaginable malice; for it hurt Alces, it disquieted Sapho, and it was prejudicial both unto Phaon and Alces, by the good office it did Nicanor. However, this Letter perhaps had not met with its intended success, if Amithone, Erinne, Phylire, Alces, Nicanor, and Phaon, had not written, and mentioned such things as confirmed what Athys had written; for Amithone, after many passages in their Caballa, mentioned that Phaon was more pleasant than ever he was in his life: Erinne for her particular, to prove the tendernes of her affection, did send her word how shee could brag, that she was the most melancholy of all the company who had been with her, except Nicanor: And Phylire writt, that if the merry humour of Phaon had not been a comfort unto her in her absence since her return, she should have been out of the world. Alces not saying directly that Phaon was either merry or sad, only filled his Letter with many pleasant conceits of Phaons: And as for Nicanor, his Page 142 Letter was so melancholly, though yet a very pleasant satyre of all our jocundry, that he confirmed what all the rest had written. But the wonder of all was, that Phaons own Letter was against himself: For though he shrouded his Joyes under a pretence of Love, yet he found not his expected effect, as I shall tell you, when you have heard Phaons Letter, which was thus written.

PHAON unto the most charming SAPHO.

MADAM,

DOubtesse you have a most strange power over me, & your words, when you please, have greater force in them then any enchantments: For your obliging expressions a little before I parted from you, did infuse such joyes into my soule, that all the harshnes of absence from you cannot hinder me from remembring them with extream delight: Judg how I shall be ravisht when you return hither.

Moreover, I hope you will take my joyes as greater testimonies of my Love, then if I had been onely a lump of sorrows; for I conceive it better to receive favours with so great a sensibility of them as shall comfort in absence, then to endure absence with so much inquietude as makes favours forgotten: Nor can I well tell which is the greater argument of love, to be sensible of favours, or to be sensible of that misfortune which severs us. Yet I desire with all my soule to heare from your owne mouth, what I ought to believe, and that I may soone protest unto you upon my knees that I am the most devoted yours.

PHAON.

This Madam, was the Letter of Phaon: As for mine, it was the only one which did him neither good nor hurt, because it did not so much as mention him: For since I thought him too merry for an absent Lover, and since I was resolved not to prejudice him, I chose rather not to speak of him at all, then to speak in his dis-advantage. But whilst these Letters were coming from Mytelene, to the place where Sapho was, she and Cydnon were talking together with all the freedom which the Countrey and friendship would allow: But they talked of things very far off any thoughts of Phaon; for indeed both of them being sitting by the Fountaine which I talked of before, discoursed upon the bitterness of absence, and the sorrows which it caused in the soules of all such as are sensible of it. For my part (said Cydnon) I am so sensible of it, that since your departure from Mytelene, I have enjoyed no delights with any tranquility; for when I made any visits, I was wishing you there: if I went any walke, I regretted your not being there; if I heard any good news, I was vexed that I could not impart it unto you: and indeed I neither did, nor said, nor thought any thing wherein you had not some share, and which did not make mee melancholly in thoughts onely of your absence. Indeed (said Sapho then) I am much obliged to you; for in my opinion, the most certaine testimonie of the tendernes in any affection is sadness in absence. But Madam, as soone as shee had pronounced these words, that Servant who brought the Letter from Athys, arrived, and presented it unto Sapho, who read it halfe aloud, to the end Cydnon might heare: But when she read that part which intimated the pleasant humour of Phaon, she blushed, and her heart trembled. Yet recollecting her selfe, she appointed the Servant to stay for an answer, and did rise up with intentions to write unto Athys: and she was no sooner risen, but another Messenger from Phaon arrived, with all the other Letters except that of Nicanors, and as for his he sent it another way. But Madam, my Sister since told me that never was the like disorder, as in the heart of Sapho; for after she had read that Letter from Athys, with such resentment as I told you, she read that of Amithones with more agitation of soul: that of Erinnes with more wonder: that from Phylire with more vexation; that Page 143 from Alces, with more pensiveness; that from Nicanor with more shame, and that from Phaon with more sorrow, though she kept it the last, in hopes of greatest delight. Imagine I beseech you Madam, what effects these Letters might worke in the mind of a Lady who could not endure the absence of Phaon without much sorrow, & who had spent a whole day with my sister in discoursing upon the bitterness of absence, and upon the sorrows which a Lover endures when he is out of her sight whom he loves. Cydnon told me that there appeared so much wonder in the face of Sapho upon the reading of these Letters, as shee thought some strange accident had hapned at Mytelene; for Sapho had read the Letter of Athys only aloud unto her, but she was not long ignorant of Sapho's wonder; for as soon as that fair one had read over all those Letters, she gave them unto my sister, and with a deep sigh, See (said she unto her) how little Phaon resembles you, and how friendship in you does more then Love in him can do.

After this, Cydnon began to read these Letters, and was not so much astonished at them as Sapho was; for she observed always, that Phaon did divert himselfe at every thing, and was never sad upon any occasion. But since she knew that I loved Phaon very well, she would endeavour to excuse him: And in order to that, she told Sapho she had no such reason to trouble her self so much at any thing vvvhich had been vvritten: For truly (said she unto her) vvhatsoever Athys, Nicanor, and Alces vvrit ought to be suspected; and you ought to read vvhat Phaon vvrit, as a thing vvvhich he had never vvritten, but because it seemed unto him as acceptable unto you; also you ought to consider vvhat Amithone, Erinne, and Phylire vvrit vvwithout any inquietude, since it's probable that Phaon at his return, seeing hovv they observed him, did only out of his prudence seem more pleasant then really he was: Ah Cydnon (replyed Sapho) I thought to be as prudent as Phaon, and yet I was not able to be merry vvithin an houre after his departure: all I was able to do, was not to appeare very melancholly, and therefore I pray never offer to excuse him, for I cannot: I know Phaon is an intimate friend unto Democedes: but Cydnon, methinks he should more have thought upon me then him: Did I think him culpable (replyed she) doubtlesse I should condemn him; why (replyed she) can you think it possible Phaon should be so pleasant as to make so many severall people speak of his jollity, but it must needs proceed from his want of Love? Ah Cydnon, it can be no otherwise: and I find him so little sensible of my absence, that I could find in my heart to banish him out of it: For my deare Cydnon, I am not able to endure, that whilst I am grieving my selfe for his absence, he should divert both himselfe and others with as much freedome of spi|irit as if he had never seen me: For my part (said Cydnon) I see him so full of joy when he sees you, as I cannot believe but he is full of sorrows when he sees you not: Reason and Love doubtlesse would have it so (replyed she) yet all these sixe severall persons depose against him, and indeed he condemns himself by his own Letter.

Appearances may so deceive (said Cydnon to her) as it would not be rationall in you to be much troubled at a thing which you know only upon uncertainties. To know it better my deare Cydnon (replyed she) I will intreat you to return unto Mytelene, I will borrow Cynegires Coach for you, and you may give it out that you are returned upon such important businesse which called you thither: I in the interim will stay here fifteen days in expectation to heare from you, whether Phaon continue his jollity as he begun: But my deare Cydnon, I conjure you to let me have every day from you a most faithfull and true relation of all his mirth, of his humours, and of his diversions; for the very truth is, if he love me only when he sees me, I will slight his love, and if I can I will quench my ovvn. Cydnon then employed all her rhetoric to appease her, but she thought it so strange that Phaon should be merry vvvhilst she vvvas sad, as all my Sisters eloquence could not alter her mind, so as she must do as she vvould have her, and return to Mytelene, upon promises of such fidelity as she durst not faile her. In the mean time Sapho answered all those Letters she received, taking no notice of any discontent against Phaons jollity: but not being able to hold out long, shee hinted these few lines unto Phaon.

SAPHO unto PHAON.

SIR,

I Make no question, but joy may sometimes be a signe of a very tender affecti|on: but I question whether it be so as you intend it. When I shall come to Mytelene, I shall see, whether yours be worthy of being valued as testimonies of that affection which you had rendred unto me.

SAPHO.

Though this Letter was something short and dry, yet Phaon never feared that Sapho was angry with him, but thought that she had so many answers to write, that she could not have time to write any longer unto him: so as never changing his way of living, he behaved himselfe after Cydmons return as he did before, which was, in seeking all occasions of cheering up himselfe in the absence of Sapho. In the mean while she sent every day a servant unto Mytelene in secret, to know from Cydnon newes of Phaon, so as she received every day something which afflicted her; for Phaon was of such an humour, that he could not deny himselfe any one pleasure, as if the reason why he was so continually with Sapho whilst he was in Mytelene, had been only because more delights were to be met vvithall there then in any other places. But this was no hinderance to him of taking up with meaner pleasures when he was out of her sight whom he loved: So as Sapho halving engaged my sister by oath to send her word of all that Phaon did, she vvnderstood that he haunted all the diversions in Mytelene, and that he seemed as if he had no discontents at his being there: so as her mind being extremely incensed against him, she could nor find a heart to see him, before she had let him know that she was displeased: To that end she sent unto him the day before her return unto Mytelene, an exact memoriall of all his delights which he had during her ab|sence, hinting unto him every particular dayes visit which he made, the pleasant walkes which he took, all the diversions which he took; and in a word, all that hee did: and to this Diurnall shee joynd a Letter which was very neer these words,

SAPHO unto PHAON.

SIR,

Since it is not to be believed that the sight of me will not adde so much unto your pleasures as my absence, I conceive that my returne will perhaps be but a disturbance unto your delights: You may perceive by this Diurnall which I send you, that I have a very exact accompt of all your diversions: but the que|stion is, whether it be to punish or to recompence you. For to tell you truly, I be|lieve we are not both of one opinion; and I am perswaded that you are not so sorry for displeasing me, as you joyed in my absence, and therefore you have no share in the affection, or esteem of SAPHO.

Since Phaon was really most extreemly in love with Sapho, and knew that she was to return the next day, he did resent this Letter vvwith much agitation of spi|irit, but hoped to make his peace at the first sight of her. Yet to the end he might see her before she came unto Mytelene, he came unto me, and after he had shev|led Page 145 me the Letter, he intreated me to go with him, and meet her at a very rugged uneven place, where all those who come in Coaches must come out of them, so that Phaon and I stayed under some willowes, in that rugged place; as soon as we were alighted from our horses, and stayed in expectation of their coming, I began to chide Phaon for his humour: For (said I unto him) how is it possible you should be much in love with Sapho, and be so little sensible of sorrow in her ab|sence? when you are with her, you are so ravished with joyes, as perswades me you would die if you were out of her sight.

The truth is (said he) one cannot have a more violent passion, than is in my Soul, and my hopes of seeing Sapho this day, does at this very houre so joy my heart, that could you but see into my soul, you vvould confess that I do love Salpho better than any loved; but yet I must needs confess, that setting my jealousy aside, there are few things can make me very sad. I do profess (said he) if I fea|red Sapho vvould not love, I think I should run into desperate madness, in what place soever I were; but when I have reason to hope I am loved, when I hear of her being well every day, and when I know she will shortly return, and I must ingeniously confess, that I cannot be pensive and melancholly vvwithout a cause: And my soul is so propence and inclinable to court all delights, to shun all sorrows, that I use all the best means I can to sweeten the harshness of absence: But for all that, as soon as I see but Sapho again, you shall see me eternally with her, and see me the most amorous of all men living.

Ah Phaon (said I unto him) to love as you do, is enough to make one be|lieve you love your self more than your mistress: But yet it is most certainly true, (replyed he) there is none in the world vvould undertake more difficulties for Salphoes service than I vvould, I vvould blindly obey her in any thing, I am more care|full, more exact, and more submiss, than ever any was; I have a heart more ten|der, than ever any had; I delight in the least of her favours, one favourable look swells me with joy, I have a million of tumultuous thoughts when I am with her, I esteem her, I admire her, and I adore her vvwith as much reverence as I do the Gods; and my joyes are so full when I talk in particular vvwith her, as never any Lover in possession of his mistress, had a fuller tesentment of delight. And after this, I pray judge whether I be not in Love, and whether you have reason to ac|cuse me for want of it.

Tis true, my soul doth naturally shun sorrows, and affects pleasures, but vvwhat does it concern the person loved, whether her Lover be sad or merry, so he never fail in any reall duties of a faithfull Lover.

As he sayd so, we saw the Coach of Cynegire appear a far off, so as Phaon and I took horse, and in a rapture of Passion, went as fast as ever he could to meet Sapho, and he was so extreemly earnest, as that it could not be questioned but that he was most desperately in Love: And if the fair Sapho had seen him, doubtless she vvould have repented of vvwhat she vvrit; and he accosted her vvwith so much joy, and love in his heart and eyes, that had she not vvwholly trusted unto Cydnon, she had doubted of her intelligence, and be|lieved that Phaon had sighed all the time of her absence. But for all that, since she could not doubt of vvwhat my Sister had vvritten, she received Phaon but vvwith a hollow and faint Civility, and had received him vvorse if Cynegire had not been present: However after these first Complements were passed, the Coach went on untill it came to the rugged place vvvhich I mentioned, where the Ladies must go on foot. I being Phaons friend, I presented my hand unto Cynegire, purposely that he might have the opportunity of talking vvwith Sapho; for this vvroughed way vvvas above two hundred Paces, before it vvvas fit to take Coach again: and the Coach not being able to go so fast as we, we rested under some Willow Trees, where I drew Cynegire apart, under pretence of talking vvwith her concerning a great design vvvhich Pittacus vvvas negotiating.

Thus Phaon had an opportuni|ty of talking vvwith Sapho, but she intending to chide him; no sooner saw him in that passionate posture, but her heart began to re|lent, whether she vvould or no; yet striving to retain her anger, she asked Phaon how he vvvas able to quit his diversions to meet her: but she asked the question vvwith a blush, so as Phaon by her looks seeing she vvould be appeased he vvvas well satisfi|ed: why, Madam, doe you aske such a question (sayd he unto her) and Page 146 vvwhat cause have I given you to vvwrite to me as you did? since I harboured no joyes but vvwhat you caused? for I beseech you, Madam (sayd he unto her) how can you think a man who had hopes in your favour, can ever be sad? Therefore, Madam, when I vvvas absent from you vvwithout sorrows, it vvvas upon no other reason, but because I knew you had not banished me your heart: And indeed, Madam, this thought vvvas so sweet, and filled my Soul so full of joyes, that as long as I vvvas hap|ppy in your love, I defied Fortune to make me miserable: Yes, Madam, provided I may enjoy your affection, I can be contented to part vvwith all my Estate, be an Ex|ile, a Prisoner, and loadned vvwith all manner of miseries, and be merry. Therefore I beseech you, Madam, I beseech you blame your self for those innocent joyes vvvhich you have caused. As for my part, I am perswaded that it vvwould argue want of love and respect, if my joyes of being loved by the Divine Sapho, were not infinitely ab|bove any sorrows that can be for her absence. Moreover, Madam (sayd he vvwith a most tender and passionate Aire) to judge how sensible I am when I am out of your sight, I beseech you consider my sensibility vvwhen I see you: Look in my eyes, most charming Sapho, and see them tell you that I think you fairer then ever, and that I am more joyed at the sight of you then ever any vvvas, and am the most in love vvwith you of all men living; but if they do tell you that I love you more then ever any other heart vvvas capable of, then I beseech you never trouble your self vvwith en|duiring vvwhat I do vvwhen I am out of your sight: but consider only, that never any Lover did prostrate himself at your feet vvwith a Passion more violent and tender then mine is; for I beseech you vvwhat matter is it how I do testifie my love vvwhen you are not in presence, so you do still find in me the same zeal and the same passi|on. For my part, I vvished you all manner of diversions in the Country, and I hoped that the jovund humour of Cydnon vvwould keep you from thinking your Solitude tedious. Oh Phaon (cryed Sapho out) you know not how to love, if you can de|sire that your absence should not trouble me: and for my part, I do declare unto you that I shall never be pleased at you, if you be not the most melancholly man living, vvwhen you are absent from me. Then, Madam (sayd he unto her) I must forget that you do love me, for if I do not, I cannot possibly be miserable: No (replyed Sapho) but on the contrary, it is the memory of that vvvhich I conceive should make you the more miserable; at least I am sure that the melancholly vvvhich your absence causeth in me, is, because I am absent from a person vvvhom I thought loved me: Oh, Madam, replyed Phaon, your opinion and mine ought to be very different in this, for it is not possible that you should rejoyce for being adored by me, so much as I should for being loved by you, so as it is no vv wonder if the memory of my passion do not comfort you in my absence, nor is it strange that the memory of your goodness to me, do lessen those sorrows vvvhich your absence causeth; for Madam, I must say again, I cannot be melancholly as long as I am sure you love me. Questionless there is much vv wit in your Language (replyed Sapho) but not much love; and if your eyes did not help out your words, I should think you do not love me; for to be absent from her, one loves, and not melancholly, is one of the greatest signs of luke-warm indifferency that can be. Oh, Madam (said he unto her) How can you think I do not love you? could you ever suspect either any of my actions or my words? All I see of you (answered she) does doubtless speak your passion, but all I see not, speaks your indifferency; for in my absence you can make many Visits with delight, you can walk abroad in company, you can be frolick and pleasant, and not the least wrinkle of melancholly appear in your countenance: and yet that which makes me most wonder, you can have delicate and tender thoughts, and express your self so passionately as if you grieved for being absent: And yet I cannot conceive how one can possess a thing with any joy which he can part with without any sorrow: And sometimes I think that you are not at all joyed at my presence, since my absence never makes you melancholly. Oh, Madam (said he unto her in such a passionate manner as made her blush) I dare defy you in this, do your worst, and you cannot choose but believe, that when I am in your presence, I am the most deep in love with you of any living: Yes, yes, Divine Sapho, though you have been told that I hunted Balles every day during your absence, that I entertained all the beauties in Mytelene: and though you have been told perhaps that I am inconstant, yet I am most confident that when you look into Page 147 my eyes, you will see my heart loves you beyond the expression of any tongue; and indeed never any Lover had more reason to love then I: For first, you are without exception the fairest in the world, I have a more propense inclination to love you than ever any had; I esteem you beyond all admiration, and I do love you the more, because both my inclination and my reason adviseth me unto it, and also because my gratitude exacts it from me: Nay, as for this last reason of your love (replied Sapho) I would never have it mentioned; why, Madam (replied Phaon) would you not have me gratefull and acknowledge your goodness and all your favours? I would have every one gratefull (replied she) but I would not have gratitude the only cause of affection, and if one should love me only because I love him, he would do me a most sensible injury: For indeed I would have one love me for so many other reasons, that though he were naturally ungrateful yet he might most zealously love me: And therefore never ranke your gratitude amongst the causes of your passion, if you would perswade me that you love me as I would be, for that is neither civil nor gallant, nor passionate. Gratitude indeed may beget amity but never Love: I would willingly you should tell me, that it fastens the knot which ties you, but as I told you before, I would not have you number it among the causes of your passion, for then, of consequence my favours must precede your affection, and on the contrary, I hoped, your affection had preceded my favours: and that if I ascribed your Love unto any cause, it should have been unto your own inclination, and my own merit, for my humour is such, as I cannot endure one should love me for any other causes. I remember (continued she) that once I hated a very lovely woman, because I discovered, that all her semblances of affection to me, did not proceed from any tenderness unto me; but only in hopes that happily I should bring her name into some of my verses, and describe her Character.

Judge therefore Phaon, whether I should take it well you should love me for any other reason, then because you think me amiable, and because you cannot chuse but love me. When Sapho had said this, and the Coach being over all the rugged way, their discourse was forced to end as well as mine with Cynequire; with whom I held a long discourse concerning the Politiques, purposely to give Phaon time enough to expresse his love unto Sapho, and make his peace with her.

However, this faire one parted not from him without some testimonies of her anger, for as they were parting, she asked him in what pleasant company he would passe away the evening, as for us (added she and pointed unto Cynequire) we shall see none this day? I shall passe it away (replied he) only with Democrates, and talk only with him of my joyes for your Returne, you had done much better, replied she, if you had talked with him before, of your sorrows for my absence. But afterwards, taking Coach, Phaon presented his hand to help her, so respectively and his eyes had such amorous looks, as Sapho could not choose but repent of her accusation, and indeed, the very truth is, it is impossible that any should be more extreemly in love then Phaon, though he could not be very sensible of such sorrows as absence caused, but on the contrary, did comfort himself with the pleasure of one thing for the losse of another: However, this chiding of Saphoes, made him passe away that night in solitude, and indeed, he was so glad that he had made his peace with her as hee needed no other delights. Not that she did say, she would pardon him, but they used to understand one another so well without speaking, that looks betwixt them were as good as words. And though Sapho had chidden Phaon very much, yet he saw by her eyes, that he was still in her heart as he was wont to be. And indeed, going betimes the next morning unto her, he concluded his Peace, and they were an hower together with all the joyes which the reconciliation of fallen out Lovers, ever causeth But at last their pleasure was interrupted by Alces, who now loving Sapho no lesse then the faire Athys, was very diligent in waiting upon her. Tis true his Mistresse came presently after but you may be sure, it was Jealousie more then love which caused her visit: and though she knew Sapho did not love Alces yet she could not choose but be jealous. Nicanor also was none of the last in paying his devotions to Sapho: And Almithone, Erinne and Cydnor comming in also, the Assembly swelled into their usuall number. At the first; Athys, Amythone and Erinne began to talk of their Page 148 Journey and their returne, which was no pleasing story unto Phaon. And they had harped much more upon that string if Phylire had not come in, and brought with her a stranger of a very handsome presence whom she presented unto Sapho, and who was Brother unto that valiant Prisoner called Morientes, whom the invincible Cyrus had saved from the flames in the wood, after he had vanquished him. But Madam, this man seemed so unlike a stranger, that none questioned but that he was some of the most Civilized Townes in Greece, and did not suspect him to be a Scythian, yet his complexion and haire did not sute with the mode of Greece, for both were very white, and he very faire, but that rule being not generall, every one notwithstanding thought him a Grecian, for he had not only the Aire and Garbe of a Greek, but also he spoke the Language very elegantly, his person was very pleasing; his stature was not very tall, but noble and gracefull, his action was free and jolly. The features of his face were agreeable and lovely, his eyes a little languishing and he had the department of a man of a high quality. Moreover his wit was both sharp and discreet, and his Aire both gallant and sprightly: his Conception of things and his expressions of them was neat. And indeed, this illustrious Scythian is a man as amiable and of as admirable parts, as any man in the World.

Sapho having alwayes a particular Genius to honour all strangers who came to visit her, she received him with that gallant civility which was naturall unto her, and to testifie how glad she was to see him, she complained against all the company, for not telling her that a stranger of such excellent accomplishments was in Mytelene. It was but yesterday Madam, replied Phylire, that a Brother of mine who hath been abroad in travells and now returned, did bring him unto me. Since he hath not been in a condition to present himselfe unto you, because he hath been a little sick, and since he stood in need of me to present him unto you when who was recovered, he desired it might be by my means that Clyrantes might know that admirable Lady of whom he hath heard talk of with so much esteem through out all the Grecian Cities where he hath travelled. Did I affect Glory more then my own satisfaction. (replied Sapho) doubtlesse I should be very sory to see a man who questionlesse will esteem me more before he is acquainted with me, then afterwards. But since I value not an ill gotten esteem, I will run the hazards of losing his, and see if I can purchase some part of his friendship in lieu of it. To destroy that esteem I have of you Madam (replied this welcome stranger and smiled) is but an ill way to get my friendship: But Madam you are so assured to keep my esteem and purchase my friendship, that you care not what you say: And though you have yet spoken but little, yet that little is so well, as I am most confident that you speak alwayes so. Wave your commendations of me Sir (replied Sapho very gallantly) until you find some reason for it: And therefore I beseech you, favour me so farre as not to flatter me until you shall find me worthy to be flattered by so well accomplished a man as your self, you are very froward Madam (replied Clyrantes) in giving that glorious attribute so suddenly upon a Scythian. I have such a Reputation of knowing the merits of men at the first (replied she) that a friend of mine sometimes saies, that I use to divine them, and therefore Sir do not suspect me of being too hasty in giving my judgment, since it is a peculiar Talent which I have, never to be mistaken in the choice of those, whom I think worthy of my commendations.

After this, all the company having part in this discourse, it was very pleasing. And since Sapho could not choose but wonder at the politnesse of Clyrantes, she asked him, how it was possible the politnesse of the Scythians should not be as much fam'd as of the Grecians, if they were all such as he was. My Country Madam, replied he, is indeed so neare Scythia that some do take us and Scythians to be al one: However, I am not only a Scythian, but originally a Sauromate which is a Country something more rude, for the customs and manners of the Sauromates were savage, yet true it is, that though I am a Sauromate, yet I am of a Country which hath no tincture of their customes: And in distinction from the other, we are called the new Sauromates; yet we hold no commerce with them, for it being our policie to hold no correspondency with any Neighbours, least strange customs should Page 149 corrupt our manners, we do all we can to live upon what our Country affords us, and not be beholding unto the commerce of other Nations.

This (replied Sapho) hath some resemblance unto the Lacedemonian Constitution, which took extraordinary care, that no strange customs should be introduced unto their owne. But when you tel me, that you hold correspondency with no Neighbours, I must confesse, that I cannot understand, how that can be and questionlesse, it would be very delightfull unto all the company, if you would be pleased to take so much paines as to make us understand it, and to relate the Originall of a people, and the manners of their Country which must needs be very pleasant, if it produce men like unto your self. I beseech you Madam, (replied Clyrantes) do not judge of my Country by me. And to render that Justice which I ought to pay unto it, I will tel you what it is: Be pleased to know Madam, that the Sauromates in general, which some do mingle with Scythians, and others distinguish, do still retain such odd customs, that their very sacrifices do speak the ferocity of their Nature. For in Lieu of building Temples unto Mars who is the God whom they adore, or erecting his statue, they heap up together a huge pile of wood, which they set on fire; and when it is consumed, they set a Sword in the midst of this great heap of Ashes, before which, they sacrifice those Prisoners which they take in Warre; yet the people have been much more cruel, and savage then now they are; for the Prince who at this day governs them, hath infused much civillie into their Natures: But in those dayes, when they were more barbarous: Fortune halving brought amongst them some Greeks, from whom the Challipides do say they are descended. they seated themselves in a place which borders upon the banks of the River Tanais, and they did so well indoctrinate some of the principall Sauromates, as they made them abhorre their own customs, and embrace theirs; in so much as one of those Grecians did insensibly get such Authority over all their Country, That the People did acknowledge one of them for their head. And the businesse came to that height, as when the Prince who then reigned over the Sauromates would oppose this Junction; he found it a very difficult businesse, for the commotion was so great and sudden, that it came to blowes. And this Greek being both valiant and prudent, the Sauromattan Prince could not vanquish him, but on the contrary, he was forced to let them have a petty Dominion, in the midst of his own Kingdom, and could not help it. For Madam, this famous Grecian assembled to gether all such as would voluntarily be his Disciples and Subjects, he drew them towards the confines of that place which he made choise of for their habitation, and wasted the Country so al about, that al seemed to be a desert Thus, after he had maintained Warrs, five or six years with much glory. the Prince of Sauromates was forced to make a Peace, and to suffer another Dominion to be in the heart of his own Kindome which was become a desert all about this new Dominion. But one of the conditions of this Peace was, that it should be equally forbidden both unto the ancient subjects of this Sauromattan Prince, and to those of this new Sovereign, to till the Lands which the last had laid wast, or to build any houses or Cottages upon it. And indeed Madam, this was so strictly observed by our forefathers, that at this day it is three great dayes journey at the least over this Wildernesse: So as one of the best cultivated Countries in the world, is hedged in with another which is not at all inhabited. And it may be well said, that your Isle is not so without Neighbours as my Country is, though it be joynted to the continent. For it is an easier matter to passe between Mytilene into Phrygia then out of my Country unto any habitable place.

This description is so very particular, replied Sapho; And the Idea of this little Dominion which hath no Neighbours, doth so please me: That if women were as well permitted to travell as men, I should be full of curiosity till I saw it. Your curiosity Madam, replied Clyrantes would be much better satisfied then you can imagine. For that illustrious Grecian our first Prince, did hedge about his Dominions with a desert, only to hedge in all the virtues, and the secrecies, which he would infuse into the soules of his Subjects, and to hinder the vices of his Neighbours, from spoiling his design: And having many able men with him, he established such good orders amongst them, as in a short time their manners were wholly changed: So as this Prince living unto a great age, he had time enough to Page 150 establish his Lawes, and left a sonne prudent enough to maintaine them. He lived to receive so much satisfaction, as to see all the Arts and Sciences flourish in his Dominions, and his memory is so deare unto us, that we accompt our years, from the time of his reign. But I beseech you Sir, (said Sapho then unto him) satisfie us a little better concerning your customs. Since Madam (replied Clyrantes) they are almost all Graecian, I should but be tedious, since you know them better then I do. It will therefore suffice if I acquaint you with what we believe.

And therefore be pleased to know Madam, that we think of the gods as you do. That except some reliques of ancient Sauromatique Ceremonies which our first King would not out of policy abolish, our sacrifices are like unto yours, our Townes, our houses, or Villages, are much resemblant unto yours here, but I must tell you that our Dominion is not so large; for there is but one great City, fifty Towns, and two hundred Villages: The truth is, that the City is one of the most pleasant places in the World; and if strangers were permitted egress and regress, its reputation would be fam'd over all the World, but since it is our custome to debarre them, the reputation of our Country is confined within its own limits, and the desarts which environ us; and we think our selves so happy in neither envying nor being envied by others that we value not the Worlds ignorance of our happinesse. But I beseech you, (replyed Amithone) when one comes into your Coun|try, are they not suffered to go out againe? They never admit of any but upon that condition, replyed Clirantes: For there are Guards kept at all the advances, and none are suffered to enter unlesse they be thought worthy. Indeed when any one hath a desire to dwell in our Country, the Guards stop them, and carry them to the Prince who transferres them unto certaine Officers appointed for that purpose, to be examined three Moneths together, to see their manners, and whether they know any thing worthy to be received amongst us, and after all this, they are to swear never to go out of the Country without the Princes leave, who useth very seldom to grant it. They are also to swear inviolably to observe all our Customes, after which they give them estates proportionable to their qualities and merit. But when any desires to travell who is a Native (replyed Sapho) must they have Licence also from the Prince? Yes Madam, replied he, and much adoe to obtaine it, but when it is granted, and they returne againe into their Country, they must also submit unto the same examination for three Moneths, to try whether their travells have not corrupted their manners.

This constraint indeed is very vexatious, and once there was a rebellion about it, which ended not without a civill Warre: But at last the Prince then reigning banished all the Rebels out of his Dominions, and this great Collonie went and inhabited towards a River which is called Danabins, where they established the ve|ry same customes which caused their Rebellion, for they made a Desart also about their Dominions like unto ours.

But Madam, not to tyre you with tedious relations of the Policy and govern|ment of my country: Give me leave to acquaint you only with the present condition of our Court, for indeed Madam, we are governed by a young Queen, who hath only one Son, and who is one of the most rarely accomplished Princes in the world. Since the Arts and Sciences are amongst us, it cannot be otherwise imagin|ed that our Court is well refined; for since we have long lived in peace, Gallantry is in its greatest lustre, Lawes are made peculiarly for Love, and there are pu|nishments ordained for unfaithfull Lovers as well as for rebellious subjects: Indeed, fidelity is held in such veneration amongst us, as it is kept untill death: Those who marry for Love, have not Liberty to marry again, but are caused to make a publi|ck declaration against it.

Moreover, it is as customary to go and comfort an absent Lover, as it is here to comfort one in mourning, and if one should frequent any diversions in the absence of his Mistress, it would be so layed in his dish, as it is never seen amongst us.

We know some amongst us (replyed Sapho and blushed) who would think that custom to be very harsh: It is so generally used amongst us (replyed Clirantes) that there are none but do observe it; for since the first founder of our state intended to keep his Subjects in their Country, he would enchain them by Love.

Page 151 Thus is Gallantry amongst us preserved as an effect of policy, our customes of Love are as ancient as our State; and almost as inviolable as our Religion: Thus cannot one change his Mistress, before he plead the causes of his inconstan|cy; nor can the mistress cast off her Lover, unless she declare the reason of her change. And since Peace, Idleness, and Plenty, do alwaies abound amongst us, nothing but Love is discoursed of in our conversations, so as those who come in|to our Country, must needs pass through the Country of the ancient Sauromates, they wonder, after they have seen so many salvage people, to find us so civiliz|ed and gallant.

Moreover, since our Founder was a Graecian, the Greek tongue is preserved al|mongst us in its purity, not that it is the vulgar language of the people; but there is not any of quality who understands it not, and there are some wits in our Court, whose lines the fair Sapha would not think unworthy of her reading. You have de|scribed your Country after such a pleasing manner (replyed Sapho) and you do so well confirm all you have said in its praises, by your own presence, that were it not so far distant from us as it is, I think I should quit my own, and go dwell there: After this, all the company had their voices in this discourse, and Clirantes did ac|quit himself so excellently well, as he got the esteem of every one. But Sapho knowing with a strange foresight, whatsoever passed in the hearts of such as she ob|served, she foretold at this very first visit, that Clirantes should fall in Love with Phylire, and Phylire should not hate Clirantes, if he stayed in their isle: And indeed, what hapned afterwards, did evidence that she was not mistaken.

In the mean time, though Sapho and Phaon were sincerely reconciled, yet there was still in Saphoes mind a strong disposition to suspect, that Phaon did not love her as she desired to be: Athys, Alces, and Nicanor, were not wanting to blow the coales of anger between them, for Phaon could not stirr any whither, but they informed Sapho, and if he was at any time pleasant out of her presence, she was immediatly told of it. And since it was not possible for him to alter his hu|mour, he still diverted himself every where, and was grieved for nothing. When he was with Sapho, doubtless he thought himself the happiest man in the world, and joy did so visibly sparkle in his eyes, that one might easily see, that she was Queen Regent in his heart, but for all that, when he did not see her, he did not grieve, and since it was not possible he should disguise his humour, especially having the eyes of so many watchfull spies upon him, who did him all the ill offices they could, Sapho could not rest in any quietness. As soon as ever Phaon was out of her sight, she still enquired what he did, and hearing commonly, that wheresoever he was, still he was very merry, she grieved more than I am able to express, though my si|ster told me some of her complaints against Phaon: Was ever any destiny compa|rable unto mine (said she one day unto Cydnon) for one would imagine, that I should be very happy in being loved by one of the most accomplished, and most al|miable men in the world, yet I should be much happier did he hate me; for his hal|tred would cure me of that affection I have unto him: But in this condition into which I am brought, I can neither hate him nor love him with any tran|quile delight, and the worst is, my misery is without remedy; for if Phaon did not love me I should hope he might hereafter love me as I desire, if he were absolutely inconst|ant, I should hope he would return unto me, and if he hated me, I should hope his hatred would not be immortal; but he loves me certainly as much as he is able to love, and were he the same when he sees me not, that he is when he doth see me, then I should desire no more; yet for all that servent love which appears in all his Actions, in all his Words, and in all his Looks, I am nothing satisfied with him, so as I am the most miserable person in the world; for since the cause of my dislike can never change, it must of necessity follow, that I shall be alwaies mise|rable.

But (said Cydnon unto her) since you are pleased with him as long as he is in your sight, therefore I would advise you to see him and marry him, to the end he may never part from you.

Ah Cydnon (replyed Sapho) though I never had taken up a constant resolution never to marry, yet the humour of Phaon is enough to make me resolve it; for if in this condition we are, I be not able to make him greive when he sees me not, Page 152 I shal not be able to do it, in a time, when perhaps I cannot make him pleased with the sight of me.

But Madam, (replyed Cydnon) what remedy can you finde? I will endeavour (said she) to make Phaon as full of sorrow as my self, which if I could bring to pass, I should be more joyed, than I am able to express: I have seen him so sensible of jealousy (replyed Cydnon) that if you would give him any cause of it, I am confident you would have those joyes you wish for. It is resolved upon (replyed Sapho) and I will from this day, begin to treat Nicanor so wel that since he can|not grieve when he sees me not, I wil perhaps make him grieve when he doth see me. And indeed Madam, the fair Sapho took up this resolution, and did put it in execution so handsomly, that Phaon grew extreemly jealous, and as sad as she could desire him to be.

At the first, she was much joyed, and all the complaints which he made unto her were so sweet and pleasing, that she would not so soon cause them to cease.

In the mean time, Nicanor could not tell from whence this his good fortune proceeded, and Alces did so wonder to see Sapho change for the worse, that he did absolutly return unto the fair Athys. However, Phaon whom the pangs of jealousy tormented, knew not how this alteration in Sapho should come to pass, yet I told him, that his humour was the cause, but he would not beleive me; and he began to hate Nicanor so horridly, that he could not endure him. Thus was this poor Lover, both hated by his Rival, and not loved by his Mistress: And his misery was the more, because having a piercing Wit, he perceived, that indeed Sapho did not love him, but still loved Phaon, so as then looking upon her favours, as an artifice to augment the Love of his Rival, he grew more angry with Sapho then with Phaon, and this miscellany of of resentments produced such pleasant effects in the hearts of these three persons, as the like was never known. But at last these two incensed Lovers, not being able to hold out any longer, they quarrelled and fought, none knowing who got the advantage, because they were parted before their combat ended: But Pittacus being a wise Prince and much grieved at the news of Tysanders death, he was so angred at this quarrell; that he banished them both for a year, to prevent any dan|gerous consequences: So as Phaon having dwelt more in Sicily, than in any other place, he resolved to spend the time of his Exile there, and Nicanor intended for Phrygia: But Phaon was so earnest with me to negotiate so for him, as Cyanon might help him to the sight of Sapho in private, before he departed, that I did what I could to satisfie him. Nor did I find much difficulty to effect it, for as Saphoes violent passion caused her to repent of making Phaon jealous, and she had as great a desire to pardon him, as he had to be pardoned, for knowing his humour, she thought that nothing could be more dangerous for her than absence. But at last, having intreated Cydnon to mediate with Sapho, and having obliged her to discover unto me that her friend had never favoured Nicanor, but only to make Phaon jealous, I told this welcom and important secret unto my friend, who at first would not beleive it, but as it is impossible to be long unperswaded of a thing which one wisheth, he thought that such a thing might be, and he resolved to clear his doubt by looking in the fair eyes of Sapho.

But at last their meeing being to be at Cydnonns house, their amity was renewed in the most tender manner in the world.

Well Madam (sayd Phaon unto her at first meeting) after you have made me the most jealous and most miserable man alive, do you now think me the most al|mourous of all your Lovers? and though my joyes in being loved by you could not perswade you, yet will my sorrows in being forsaken, work with you? had you been forsaken (replyed she) you should never have had opportunities to make your complaints unto me, for I would never have seen you: But Phaon, if you have suffered any torments thank your selfe, since if you had known how to Love, I should never have taught you by any so vexatious a course as jealousy:

Truly madam, (said he unto her) your invention was most cruell. But I beseech you tell me? Did you never love Nicanor? and did you still love me? Let me tell you only half of what you aske (answered she and blusht) and guesse your self at the rest.

Page 153 After this, Madam, these two incensed Pensons being insensibly pacified, they expressed themselves unto each other, in as passionate and tender termes that Love could invent: yet Saphoes joyes were not compleat, for the thought of this long and cruell absence did so disquiet her, that she did not fully enjoy the sweets of this pacification. (For said she unto Phaon) what can I expect from you and your hu|mour? you I say, who are never moved but with what you see, and not at all with what you see not, for though it were possible you should continue faithfull du|r|ing this long absence, yet it is impossible you should suffer as much as I do: and since you are capable of joyes and delights, within two dayes after you have left me, what will you do when you have been whole Moneths out of my sight, have, I not reason to feare the loosing of you, for in a long absence, I know nothing but sorrow which can be a faithfull guard over the heart of a Lover. Indeed love is so accustomed to grow amongst pleasures as it may well be said that joy is the first ne|cessary disposition unto its growth. And since questionlesse your mind will be all upon delights as soon as ever you are out of my sight; I have reason to believe, that some new Love will take possession of your heart, and drive mine out.

Since Madam I never loved any comparably so much as you (replyed Phaon) because I never found any comparably so amiable as to merit my affection, I must in|geniously confesse that I never had any great commerce with Love, untill I saw you. The truth is, I have a hundred times perceived a passion begin to flash a little and extinguish againe in the very presence of her I thought to have loved, and indeed I have some dayes been so unlike my selfe from my first entrance into company untill I went out againe, that I knew not my selfe. I must confesse I had some desires which begun both to live and die, in one and the same day, not knowing well why I had them, nor why I had them no longer.

But as for you Madam, your power has a greater influence upon me, I love you after another manner, and when I do apprehend the bitterness of this horrid absence, I begin to prepare my self for infinite miseries, for this bitter absence is unlike all the rest; indeed, when you were in the Country. I alwaies expected your return so shortly, that it was no wonder if my hopes of soon seeing you should diminish my sorrows, and that my beileif of your loving me, was so joyfull unto me, as to keep me from grieving: But alas Madam, a whole year looks like a little eternity to me, and I shall go away in fear, that you are not fully perswaded of the greatness of my Love.

But Madam, I beseech you judge me not by what is past, since certainly I never loved you, so much as I now do. Yes divine Sapho, I do love you more than ever, and more than ever I shall any other, and more than ever I can hope to be loved, I beleive it, (said she, and interrupted him) but for all that, in all appearances you do love me less, then you thought you did after you had been fifteen dayes out of my sight.

After this, returning a very plausible answer, he made a million of protestations of fidelity unto the fair Sapho, and in such a passionate manner, as she was perswaded that the heart of Phaon was changed, and that he would resent this long absence with abundance of sorrow; so as both of them used the most delicate and passionate expressions, that Love could possibly infuse into the hearts and tongues of two persons deeply in Love, and ready to depart from each other: Thus Sapho and Phaon parted, infinitely satisfied and reconciled: Phaon imbarqued the next morning; and Sapho went in the country, carrying my sister with her; but she went not thither, so much to enjoy the sweets of solitude, as to hide the sorrows of her soul, and to avoid bidding adieu unto Nicanor who know too well, that all the favour he received, belonged not unto him. But Madam, since Phaons departure, Sapho was all melancholly: 'Tis true, at her return unto Mytelene she contracted a very great league of friendship with Clyrantes, who was so extreemly in love with Phylire, as none could be more.

In the mean time, the company at Saphoes was nothing so pleasant as heretofore, because she was grown to very melancholly that she shunned as much as handisomness would permit her all occasions of delight, so all the good company broke up: For Alces at last married Ashys, who since her marriage did not frequent Saphoes.

Page 154Erinne, she fell sick of a languishing disease: my sister went into Phrygia with my Mother, who was of that Countrey, and Amithone went into the Country, so as I was the only One left, unto whom Sapho could talke with any confidence: And yet she had one deare friend whom I did not mention at the beginning of my relation, because she was absent from Mytelene during all the time of this long love: but since she returned the same day my sister departed, it may well be sayd she took her place: And certainly she was worthy of Sapho's friendship, though her fortunes were not so high as the rest of her friends.

Indeed, this Lady who was called Agelaste, by reason of her melancholly temper, had most rare qualities: her person did please much more then some could who were fairer then she: She was not tall, but handsome, her hair was brown, her eyes gray and sweet, her face a little long, her nose something high, her mouth pretty, her complexion well, but a little pale; her teeth white, her neck admirable, her hands and arms faire, and her Physiognomy so wise and modest, that every one had a good opinion of her at the very first sight.

Agelaste also played upon the Lute most admirably: But I alwayes most esteemed her for her wit, her discretion, her goodnesse, and her fidelity were so great, that one might trust her with any thing in the world: Moreover, though she was naturally melancholly: Yet she would be very pleasant in company, especially with her intimate friends, for unlesse with them she spoke little: Agelaste then, being as I have described her, she was inseparable from Sapho, since all the rest of her friends had left her: And Phylire also did visit her much oftner then she did before: The truth is, Sapho stood in need of some comfort at that time, for you must know that Cynegire with whom she lived, and to whom she was much obliged, dyed: and a few dayes after she heard that her Brother, of whom she alwayes heard bad newes, was faine in love with a Slave called Rhodope, whom Esope also had loved, and that the passion of Charaxes had been so extreame, that after he had enfranchised her, his love of her had quite ruined him.

Also Sapho understood that Rhodope, whose beauty and art had rendered her more famous in Aegypt, then her vertue had, she sent him back to Mytelene in a most lamentable condition. Moreover, the death of Tysander had so altered the Court of Pittacus, that people did not live in that Citie as formerly they did; yet Sapho was so happy as to finde a satisfaction in her selfe without seeking it in others.

In the mean time, the greatest inquietude which she had being Phaons absence: she was forced (though she did not affect to have any Confident) to let me talke unto her sometimes, for I was the conveyer of all the Letters between Phaon and her; yet it was not possible to have many Letters from him, which was no small addition to her inquietudes: But Madam, she was much more restlesse and unquiet a little after, when she receiving a packet from Phaon which I brought in all hast unto her, she found besides her Lovers letter, a Note directed unto him, written with a womans hand; but so scurvily writ, that it was evident, she who writ it was not guilty of over much wit. In the mean time, it appeared by it that Phaon had writ many Letters unto her, that he was much in her favour, and that he had given her severall Serenades: And indeed Madam, I understood after|wards, that though Phaon did love Sapho most passionately, yet he would sometimes solace himself with that faire Foole whom he had formerly loved in Sicily. Not that there was any comparison between those thoughts which he had of Salpho and this faire Sycilian; for his passion was most zealous and servent to the first of these, and his engagements to the other might rather be called a musing, then any reall affection. However, he did divert himself as much as if he had not been absent from that person whom he loved with most passionate tendemesse. But to return unto Sapho, you may imagine Madam, how she was surprized to find in Phaons packet this note directed unto her, and a Note stuffed with the most fond, simple gallantry in the world: indeed, I think that never such a piece was seen, yet the Character was faire enough, but that served only to render it ridiculous; for the Orthography was so bad, the sense so shallow, the expressions so poor, and the order of words so confused, and opposite unto all rules of eloquence and reason, as it is a wonder how any woman of quality could possibly write after Page 155 such a rate. But the oddest thing was, that the Letter which Phaon writ unto Sapho was the most elegant, the most gallant and passionate peece that ever was seen: so as it was not credible, that any man who writ so well, could hold any particular correspondency with a woman who writ so ill: Yet it appeared by this Note, that Phaon did often see her, and that he had given her severall Serenades as I told you before: And I assure you Sapho was so sadly astonished at this cruell adventure, that not being able to hide her sorrows, she communicated them unto Agelaste, and me.

Did ever any see such unparalleled weaknesse as this in your friend? (said she unto me) I know that when he sees me, he loves me as much as he is capable of: I know also, that then he thinks himselfe unable to take delight in the company of any other person: and yet it appars by this Paper, that he bears some kind of affection unto the veryest fool in the world, and that hee mingles her Letters and mine indifferently together, though I think mine have some order of sence in them, and those of his new Mistress none. Since I knew the humour of Phaon better then Sapho did, I did my friend the best office I could, and endeavoured to perswade this admirable woman, that the heart of this Lover had no share in any of these pleasures which he took during his absence, and that Phaon lived as he did, rather to look upon these trifles, then to divert himself in them.

Ah Democedes (said she unto me) a grieved Lover cannot find a heart to look upon such trifles: And if Phaon loved me as he should do, the most pleasing Serenades would never divert him: he would be so indisposed to give them unto others as he doth, that he would shun the place where others give them: And therefore I am resolved to love him no longer, but will hate my selfe▪ if I cannot hate him. It was in vain for me to protest unto Sapho that Phaons love did not change, and that it was only an effect of his humour, wherein his heart had no share, for she would not believe it: so as in the rapture of her sorrows, she answered Phaon in a very singular manner, for she sent him back the note which he had unawares sent unto her, and writ only these words.

SAPHO unto PHAON.

SIR,

Since you have contracted amity with a Lady, whose Letter I have sent you backe, resolve to breake off ours; for I thinke it an unworthy thing in me, to let a man have any share any longer in my heart, who hath withdrawn his owne from mee to give it unto another, so much unworthy of himselfe.

SAPHO.

This Letter doubtlesse was enough to enforce sorrow into the soule of Phaon: but to tell you truly, I writ him another which grieved him to the very heart of his soule; for I chid him so home for his levity, and did so terrifie him with his likelihood of loosing Sapho's affection, that as soon as he had read her Letter and mine, he became a Convert: when he considered that Sapho perhaps would |draw her heart from him, he easily resolved to quit the lesser delights to preserve the greater: so as knowing no better way to reconcile himselfe unto Sapho, then by quitting Sicily, and coming to her, he resolved to come disguised unto Lesbos, and accordingly he came in a Merchants Ship: And landing at a Port in a corner of our Isle, he concealed himself with a friend who had a house very near unto that of Sapho's in the Countrey. He was no sooner there, but enquiring where she, and I was, but he understood that I was gone a journey of fifteen dayes, and that Sapho was at her own house without any other company then her dear Agelaste: so as losing no time, and knovving her usuall hours of valking unto that Fountain Page 156 vvhich formerly I mentioned, he went and hid himselfe in a little thicket of Trees vvhich grevv about it, leaving his horse some fifty paces off vvith a Lac|quey: he had not waited there a quarter of an houre but he favv Sapho and her friend appeare; and savv her so sad, that as insensible as he vv as of sorrowv, his heart was tendered: 'Tis true, the thought of being so tenderly loved by the most excellent woman in the world, did make him more joyed at it, then Sapho's sadnesse made them melancholly. However, he would give her time to sit downe before he would shew himselfe, to the end he might a little digest those sorrows which this fight caused in him. But as it chanced, these two Ladies did sit down upon a seate of Grasse with their backs towards Phaon, so as he could easily hear what they said; for the Grove was very thick in that place, and he crept so gently, that they could neither heare nor see him. They were no sooner set, but Sapho began to speak. But my deare Agelaste (said she unto her) there is so little appearance in what you tell me, that I know not whether I should believe it, and therefore I desire to know all the particulars of this adventure. They are very easily known (replied she) For yesterday in the afternoon I understood from the mouth of Phylire, that Clirantes (whose quality is so great that he is neer Cousen to the Queen of Sauromates) is so much in love with her, as that he will marry her, if she will follow his fortunes, and go into his Country. So as Phylire who loves him no less than he her, and is freely in his own disposition, she is resolved upon it, and ready to follow this Illustrious Sauromate. But since she desires the businesse may be done without any noise, she imparted the secret unto me, and willed me to de|sire that you would be pleased to let them be married in your house; which done, they would presently after depart, and go into that Countrey, where there are such severe Laws against unfaithfull Lovers. I wish with all my heart (replied Sapho) that the inconstant Phaon were there also, that he might be punished for his levity. And Agelaste (continued she sighing) since I know you have no great businesse at Mytelene, but all places in the world are alike unto you, why may not we two follow Phylire into the happy Country of Clirantes? For I must confess I cannot endure living in Mytelene.

But Madam (replied Agelaste) as long as Phaon is in your heart, I would not advise you to go into a Country where he cannot be admitted: As long as I am not in Phaons heart (replied Sapho) I should be glad to be in any place where I may never see him: and therefore my deare Agelaste, if you be able to follow my Fortune, we will both of us follow Phylires: For truly there is nothing in Mytelene which doth not displease me: Charaxes is come to persecute me, all the world wearies me, I shall never see Phaon there: Or if I do, I shall see him inconstant, so as I shall think him unworthy of my affection. Oh Madam (cried he out, and came out of the place where he was hid, and kneeling down before her) Do not use the most faithfull Lover alive so unjustly: and to testifie that I am such a one, I beseech you let me go with you into that happy Countrey where all unfaithfull Lovers are so severely punished: For since I shall never be absent from you there, I shall not fear the Laws which are made against such as divert themselves in the absence of their Mistresses: Is it possible Phaon (said Sapho) that you should be so impudent as to speak thus after your last crime? Yes Madam (said he unto her) the love of my soule unto you hath taught me so much impudence, that I dare beseech you to do unto me as I do understand Phylire intends unto Clirantes: For Madam, it is as certain as that the Heavens are above us, that I am the most faithfull Lover upon Earth: Carry me into any place where I can never go from you, and you will find me the most constant Lover that ever lived: I can never confesse that my weaknes did ever merit the name of inconstant: For Madam, I have adored you every minute of time since I first knew you: I must confesse that I have a soule which is addicted unto pleasures, and vvith flies from any sad thoughts: But for all that, since I had any apprehensions of loving you, I have quitted all that you can imagine may steale avvay my heart, and upon my knees I beg the favour never to let me leave you againe: I know that I cannot vvith safety appeare in Mytelene, and that I am to continue yet a long time banished: But if it be so that you do love me, you will also banish your selfe Page 157 for the love of me: For the very truth is Madam, I will never be absent from you againe; and I am so fully resolved upon it, that though I were sure Pittacus would arrest me to morrow, yet would I not stirre, for I had rather be his prisoner then not your slave Madam, and I would endure any torment in the world, rather then hazard the losing you. Try Madam (said hee unto her) whether you are able to undertake a bold resolution: I have left Sicily you see, as soon as I saw there was a necessity of justifying my selfe in your opinion: Quit therefore Lesbos Madam without regret, to the end you may be as sure of me; I will not li|mit you Madam, unto any place upon earth, since there is none wherein I cannot finde a happinesse, so I may see you, and so you be unto me as formerly you have been, and as I hope you will be still, notwithstanding all my imbecilities. But Phaon (said Sapho then) is it possible you should think what you speak? and can I ever think that a man who is so familiar with such a simple person as she whose Letter I sent you, can ever affect me who does nothing resemble her? Tell mee Phaon, did you love her? Did you cease loving me? Do you love me yet? or do you now now begin to have some affection to mee? must I look upon that love which I see in your eyes as a faithfull love? as a feigned love? or as a newly revived love? Look upon it Madam (replied he) as a Love mortall which may sometime hide it selfe, but can never extinguish: And therefore for your owne tranquility Madam, and for my happinesse let us make our fortunes inseparable.

After this, Sapho desired him to make an ingenuous confession of his last weaknesse, and to relate all his adventures in Sicily, which he did with so much sincer|ity, that Sapho was satisfied. Yes Madam (said he unto her) I will confesse, that finding there a person whom I loved before I knew you; but Madam, she did afford me only imperfect joyes, and my heart was never wholly engaged: I have also received from her some signes of tender affection; but I was without any trouble, ever ready to quit them as soon as you called me back.

The truth is Madam, I was a little weak, but not inconstant: my eyes 'tis true did find that you were not the only faire one upon Earth; but my heart never found any whom it could truly love but only the most admirable Sapho. And to give you security against any future weaknesse, I beseech you make choise of what desert Isle you please where we may live together: For my part, I professe that you are my All: and so I may see you, I desire nothing else. Though I did nothing but heare you speak, yet would my felicity be great: the charms of your wit, without being seconded by those of your beauty, are enough to render me most happy: All other persons that ever I met withall are so ill practised in the Art of obliging, that their greatest favours are but trifles in comparison with the least of yours.

After this, Phaon used many more most tender and passionate expressions unto the admirable Sapho who answered him a long time as if she would not pardon him: but at last her anger cooling whether she would or no, she did not make him despair: but taking a medium between these two extreames, she permitted him to hope for a pardon & promised to meet him the next morning in the same place.

But Madam, why should I hold you so long from the end of this adventure? Sapho spent the whole night with Agelaste in considering what to resolve upon; and upon serious debate she concluded that she could not live happily upon the earth without the love of Phaon, and that she could not assure her selfe of his affection as long as he was from her: So that after she had well considered how to order all her businesse concerning her estate, she resolved to put Phaon unto a great tryall of his love by obliging him to follow her in her design of going with Phylire, and by obliging him to follow her upon certainties never to marry her: And hast being requisite in the businesse, because Phylire was to be married vvithin eight dayes, and to depart the morrow after the solemnization; Sapho acquaint|ed Phaon the next day with her resolutions: At the first he liked the proposition of going with her into the Countrey of the new Sauromates very well, but he found it a hard chapter to promise he would never importune her unto marriage: But at last, since she gave him leave to love her, and promised to love him, he promised to do what she pleased: so as after this, Sapho thought her selfe the happiest person in the world, and Phaon also thought himselfe the happiest Lover Page 158 upon earth, since Agelaste had neither Father nor Mother living, but had lost all which could render Lesbos delightfull unto her, she followed the fortune of Sapho who left her own Country with as much joy as Phaon had, to be in her favour And they both of them so satisfied each other by this resolution, that they were most glad to be quit of it. I was not at Mytelene when this passed: My Sister was in Phrigia, and though we had been with Sapho, I believe she would not have imparted her design unto us, least we should oppose it.

The greatest motive unto her forwardnesse in this designe was, that knowing there was but one City in all this little Dominion of the new Sauromates, Phaon could not be often from her, so as being satisfied with his love in her presence, she hoped that place would yield her much content, since he could not possibly be long absent from her.

In the meane time, Agelaste having acquainted Phylire and Clirantes with the designe of Sapho and Phaon, they were extreemly glad of it, for that illustrious Sauromate, did know, that all those Persons would easily be admitted into his Country. Also considering the credit which he had with the Queen, he made no question but all this good company would be extreemly well entertained. There great comfort in this journey was, that they had no thoughts to take for their subsistence. For Clirantes first assured them, that his estate was sufficient to main|taine them all in full luster, and besides this, it was the custome of the Country for the Prince to give such estates unto such strangers as are received, as is fitting for their quality and merit, and all this, Philires brother did know of a certainty.

In the mean time, since Sapho did depart with intentions never to returne againe, she disposed of her estate as if she were going to dye, and left Letters which con|tained her will, in the hands of an old Kinswoman she had with orders not to open them untill a month after: After which, the marriage of Clirantes and Phylire was secretly solemnized: And the next morning all this good company embarqued, with intentions to passe the Bosphorus of Thrace, and to enter into the Euxine Sea afterwards to land about the Maeotidan lake. But they were no sooner imbarqued, then there did rise a Tempest which changed their course, for after it had tossed them from place to place, and from shore to shore, it cast them upon Epirus at the foot of a great Rock which is beaten upon by the Leucadian Sea, and upon which is built the Temple of Apollo; This Rock hath also another thing vv|ry observable, for it is said that there and from thence Deucalion, when he was in love in Thessalia did throw himselfe into the Sea, and cooled his passion.

However, after all this good company had rendred thanks unto the gods there adored, and after their ship was repaired, they imbarqued and steered their course very prosperously, as Meriontes told me. But Madam, before I tell you any fur|ther what he related unto me, I must acquaint you with the wonder of all them in Mytelene when Saphoes Cosen opened the Letters, in which she had declared how her Estate should be disposed of: For when she was gon; she coloured her journey with the accomplishment of a vow to Diana, who had a Temple some three days journey from Lesbos.

But when they saw she disposed of her Estate as one who would never return againe, they knew not what to think.

In the mean time, out of her generosity, she left almost her Estate unto Cha|lrxas, though they were at great difference; as for all those things which were in her closet, she bequeathed them amongst her friends, not mentioning her design, nor the place unto which she was gone: So as every one thought and spoke accord|ing to their fancies. Since some reports went a broad, that she was displeased with Phaon for falling in Love in Scicily. and since they knew not that he was returned un|to her, some beleived that she was gone unto him, others said that she cast her selfe away, and indeed this last beleif was the most generall, though not the most probable. For since it was known that Sapho was at her house in the country, before she imbarqued; the Plebeans, who always love wonders, and often beleive them sooner than probabilities, did say, that as she was by the side of that pleasant Fountain which I mentioned a Nagade appeared unto her, who did bid her go un|to Epirus, and that she should throw her self into the sea, in a place where a Du|calion formerly had thrown himself, and that she should there be cured of her passion, Page 159 as he was of his, adding afterwards, that Sapho did immediately obey the Nagade, that she went unto Epirus, that she did precipitate her self, and that death in the end cured her passion. But the truth was, the more understanding sort of people, did not credit any such far fetcht unlike stories; for Sapho was known to be wiser than so: Also after I was returned unto Mytelene, I made such exact inquisition, that at last, this friend of Phaons with whom he had concealed himself some certain dayes, did discover unto me that Phaon had been with him, that he had seen Sapho very often, and that he was gone away with her, but since he knew no further, I was still ignorant of my friends design: However, I was so far satisfied, that I knew Sapho was not dead, and that Phaon was happy in her favour, for I might well imagin, that they would never have gone together, unless they had been very well reconciled. But the passage most observable was, that though Phylire, her brother, and Agelaste were vanished as well as Sapho, yet they were not so much as mentioned; for Saphoes adventure did so take up their spirits and minds, that they talked of none but her.

In the mean time, the poor Nycanor was a gainer by this accident; for when he heard that Sapho had drowned her self, because she thought Phaon perfidious he cured himself of his passion, thinking it not fit to love the memory of one whose love was so extreame to another:

As for Damophile, she was the only one who rejoyced at Saphoes ruin, because then she thought her self the only wise woman in Mytelene.

But Madam, after my sister was returned from Phrygia, we discovered that Clirantes had married Phylire before they departed, so as remembring we heard from Clirantes an admirable description of his Countreys Laws, we imagined, that it was thither unto which Sapho, Phaon, and Agelaste were gon, and so confidently, as to satisfie my self, I underdertook this voyage with Leontidus, whom I met.

In the mean time, I may say that this journey did prosper neither well nor ill: For I understood by the valiant Meriontes, that Sapho and Phaon were received by the Sauromartan queen, with more honours than ever were done unto any stran|gers, that she was lodged in the Queens own Pallace, that Phaon was lodged in Clirantes his house, that they were both of them the delights of that Court, that Phylire is there in high esteem, and that Agela|e hath gotten the hearts of all the Gallantry. But that which is most considerable, Phaon is at this present, the most faithfull Lover in the world, and Sapho the happiest person upon Earth, for she is adored by all the Court, it is she who distributes all the favours which the Queen of Sauromates confers upon any; and she sees Phaon continue constant in most servent and everlasting affections. And yet they had a little quarrell since they came thither, for since there are Laws and Rules for Love, and since there are Judges who study nothing but what relates unto that passion, Phaon com|menced a suit against Sapho, because she would not permit him to hope ever to marry her: Sapho, she put in her answer, and pleaded her own cause, as Phaon did his, and both did it most admirably well: But in conclusion, Sapho did make it so evidently appear, that the way to love eternally with equall flames, was never to marry, that the Judges gave sentence against Phaon, and condemned him not to urge her any more by way of suite; declaring, that it was a favour which he ought to expect from her self, and that he would esteem himself the most happy Lo|ver in the Earth, and being loved by the most excellent person in the world, and by a person who would not deny him the enjoyment of her self, but only because she would always enjoy his heart; so as after this, they lived in the sweetest tran|quility that is imaginable: But what is most cruell for me, is, that Meriontes told me, Sapho and Phaon were so afraid, least any should come from Mytelene to di|sturb their happiness, as they have obliged the Queen, strictly to forbid the reception of any strangers into that country for ten years, so as my journey is stopped. Thus whilst Sapho is enjoying the good fortune which she deserves, she is beleiv'd to be dead throughout all Greece, and will ever be so beleiv'd; for I understand that the ship which carried them, did perish in its return.

Thus whilst this famous Lesbian is doubtless every day composing most gallant, and passionate fancies in Verse, all the illustrious wits of Greece, are writing Epitaphs unto her glory.

Page 160Democedes having ended, all the company was so full of wonder, that none were able to impose silence upon themselves, and if the business of the invincible Cyrus had not urg'd his return, the applauses of Sapho had taken up all those illustrious persons a longer time. But as the fervent love of Phaon and Sapho did revive his Love of Mandana in his heart, he hasted away, to see if Anacharsis had sent any good news from Thomyris, therefore after many a complement unto the Queen of Pontus, and the Princess of Armenia, he bade them adieu, but to the great grief of those Princesses, Tygranes, and Spitridates followed Cyrus, and had not time enough to shew the sorrows which they had to leave them, yet Spitridates took an opportunity to draw Araminta aside, and expressed so much affection unto her, that she could not choose but shew some of her tenderness unto him. I perceive Ma|dam (said he unto her after many other things) that I never find you, but I presently loose you again, and I no sooner begin my joyes at the seeing of you; but I must grieve for parting from you. But my comfort is (added he) we shall be so neer, that I shall every day let you know my sufferings, as I send you the victo|ries of Cyrus.

Since there is no victory, but may cost too dear, (replyed she most obligingly) I shall never be at rest: For truly Spitridates, we are both of us born under such unhappy Planets, that doubtless our Fears ought to be greater than our Hopes, However Madam, (said Spitridates) I shall not loose my hope, of being loved by you, if the Gods be pleas'd I should live after the victory of Cyrus, or else of being lamented, if they are resolv'd I should perish in the War, so death not forbid|ding my hope, you Madam I hope will give me leave to preserve it: For I find it so sweet to be assur'd I shall receive testimonies of your affection living or dead, that no thought can be more pleasing unto me. And therefore Madam, that these thoughts may never abandon me, do me the honour to tell me, that I have reason to entertaine them: you may be so assur'd of them Sir, answered she, as you would do me an injury to ask me new assurances. Hope therefore Spitridates, as much as you can for happinesse (said she and blushed) and I will in your absence both hope and wish the sight of you againe.

After this, Cyrus having done all his civilities, Spitridates must leave A·riminta; And Tigranes must content himselfe to tell his faire Onesile in two words, that his heart was full of sorrow to part so soone.

Cyrus in his returne to the Camp call'd Leontidus to him; with whom he thought that he had not talked enough concerning Thrasibulus, yet he talked not to him all of that Prince, for he sked him of his love, and asked him the meaning, of that which he said, when he assur'd him, that he had no mind to expose himself unto the most dangerous of all jealousies; Sir, replyed Leontidas, I can quickly give you satisfaction in that: For after I had been jealous of my friends, of my enemies, of my equals, of inferiours of superiours, I found that Alcideama who had lost her beauty, did recover it againe, and I found her so favourable, that I saw I could marry her But Sir, when I saw my self in this condition I perceiv'd also, that I should be still jealous after I had marry'd her, for seeking about for her reason why she should so suddenly change her thoughts of me, I found out that she lodg'd very neer one of her ancient Lovers. Also I was resolv'd, that if I did marry her, to carry her into the Country the very next day. So as perceiving in my heart a disposition to be a jealous Husband, as I had ever been a jealous Lover. I conceiv'd that I should have liv'd a most miserable life, if I had marry'd Alcideama, therefore out of my feares of hating her and being hated my selfe, I thought it better not to marry her; for I may cease to be jealous in ceassing to love, but when I am a Husband and jealous, then Jealousie will not cease with the passion which caus'd it; but this thing cal'd Honour which causeth so much jealousy as well as love causeth jea|lousie to last till death, and would never let me live in quiet. For there is no re|conciliations of Husbands and Wives, as there is between Lovers and Mistresses, the one hath a thousand sweets in it, and the other nothing but quarrells and persecutions. And therefore Sir, having had tryall of all sorts of jealousies, and apprehending this kind to be the worst of all, I am resolv'd never to try it but have broke off with Alcideama, never to renew againe.

If you had bin as much in love as you were when you thought Policrates lov'd your Page 161 Mistressse (replyed Cyrus) you would not have been so foreseeing, nor would you have refus'd the enjoyment of her. But certainly so many severall sorts of Jealousies have damp'd your passion, and being then more prudent than amorous, perhaps you knew that Alcideama would always give you causes of jealousy.

However it be Sir (added he) I am fully resolv'd never to love any thing but glory: and knowing I could meet with it no where so soon as with you, I am come to dye in your service, or at least to fight for the liberty of the Princesse Mandana.

Cyrus having return'd a very civil answer unto Leontidus, he talk'd a little with Democedes concerning the most admirable Sapho, and so afterwards unto every one which followed, especially unto Spitridates and Tigranes, whom he lodg'd next unto his own Tent: And to testifie his confidence in them, he shew'd them the next mornig the manner of his Encampment; and confer'd with them of his design to assault the Enemy as soon as the Truce was ended: In order to that, he observ'd unto them the situation of the ground, & all the advantages which might be taken, every one giving his opinion and his reason for it. But since the opinion of Spitridates did not concur with that of Cyrus, who thought it better to go unto the Enemy another way then that which Cyrus shew'd him, he intend'd silently to go and observe the severall Quarters nearest hand, and the rather, because the Truce did afford him the liberty.

On the other side, whilst Anacharsis was negotiating in vain with Thomyris and Arcantes, Aripithes was extreemly angry, because the Queen of Massagettes did use him so ill, so as his fancy was full of violent resolutions. And indeed, the Prince conceiving that if Cyrus were dead, then he might sooner gain the heart of that Queen, he resolv'd that either he, or his Rivall should perish. In order to this, he stole away in the night from the Camp of Thomyris, and went towards that of Cyrus, disguis'd in the habit of a Persian, the better to passe un-observ'd amongst the Troops of that Prince: For knowing his generosity and courage, he was perswaded, that as he had fought with the King of Assyria, and offer'd the like unto Ariantes, so he would not deny him the same honour: So as taking his way, he came about Sun-rising unto a little hill which was between the two Camps, where Spitridates was also arriv'd, the better to observe the severall grounds which he thought most fit to seize upon to fight the Enemy with advantage, and to the end that afterwards he might better perswade Cyrus. In the mean time this Prince having none with him but one Squire, as Aripithes had, they met upon equall termes.

Spitridates seeing Aripithes in the habit of a Persian, did not at first take him for an Enemy: But Aripithes being mistaken by the resemblance which Spitridates had with Cyrus; he no sooner saw him, but supposing him to be his Rivall, he was so transport'd with fury, that his eyes were not able to discern the little difference which was between those two Princes. Indeed, he thought that Cyrus had something more high and noble in his Aire than Spitridates had, though Spitridates had as brave a presence as any man in the world. The soule of Aripithes then being swelld with all the animosities of a despis'd Lover, he drew his sword; and advancing towards him whom he look'd upon as the only Eclipser of his glory and felicity: Though I never saw you since you bore the name of Artamenes (said he unto him in the Assyrian Language, which Spitridates understood) yet I can know you to be Cyrus, and will look upon you as one that shall be a Victime offer'd unto the love of Aripithes, who cannot be happy as long as you are living.

Were I indeed Cyrus (replyed Spitridates, and went back apace to draw his Sword) the event of the Combate would not be dubious, but your defeat would be infallible: Yet though I am not so valiant as he, yet perhaps I shall let you see that I shall easily overcome any Enemy of his: Aripithes being all fury, did but confusedly understand what Spitridates said: but in lieu of answer, he fell upon that Prince who received him with so much vigour, that Aripithes had not leasure to undeceive himselfe of his error, that it was Cyrus whom he fought with:

Spitridates looking upon his Antagonist as an Enemy unto Cyrus, he fought Page 162 with as much feare as if he had been his own particular Enemy, so as Aripithes found his valour too weak to vanquish such an Enemy: insomuch as fury being the absolute mistress of his mind, he expos'd himselfe in such a desperate manner as it was easie to see, he was resolv'd either to vanquish, or dye, and wish'd for no more but either victory, or death: Yet he fought so valiantly, that he mov'd Spitridates to esteem him, though he knew him not; for he saw, that if this fierce Enemy had manag'd all his advantages well, he had found him a hard taske to overcome: Not but that the blows of Aripithes did hit, and pierc'd the armes of his Enemy in many places: but Fortune did enfeeble the arme of Aripithes, purposely to preserve Spitridates, who had only one slight hurt in his left arme; whereas on the contrary, Spitridates could not touch Aripithes, but he sanguin'd his armes, and wounded him in so many places, that he saw the victory was not like to be his; nor could he hope for any help from his Squire, for he was also vanquish'd by him who belonged unto Spitridates.

Things being thus, Cyrus knowing that Spitridates was gone to view the places which rais'd their Contest: and desiring to see them again, he arriv'd at the place where this Duel was fought: so as knowing Aripithes at first, and doubting but that he was mistaken in the resemblance of Spitridates unto him, he went hastily to them to let this Sauromate Prince see his error, and to make him repent his assaulting a Prince who was not his Enemy. And adding words unto his Presence, Aripithes knew him; and was so astonish'd, that he recoyld some paces back to consider upon the strange adventure. After that he plainly saw his mistake, had I seen the blood of my Enemy (said he unto Spitridates) I should not repent had I let it out as I do of yours; nor should I ever have complain'd of that which I have lost, or of my being vanquish'd: I am so fully perswaded, valliant stranger (replyed Spitridates modestly) that it was the name of Cyrus which vanquish'd you, that I do not pretend unto the glory of our Combate, since it is rather the fortune of that Princes Arms which are invincible, then my own valour which kept me from being vanquish'd. No (said Cyrus) since you have supply'd my place, the valour of Aripithes found greater resistance then he could have from me: But valiant Enemy (said he and turn'd towards him) since you have a desire I should be yours, I am well contented to bee so, though I am not your Rivall. And to stay until you are in a condition to finde the difference between the valour of Spitridates and mine, let me conduct you into one of my Tents, that you may be dress'd with as much care as if you were the best of my friends: No, replyed Aripithes fiercely, for generous Enemies ought not to receive any thing from each other but death: And because I will not lessen my hatred by receiving of benefits, I will refuse your offer, and desire no other favour from you, but to let me return unto the Camp of Thomyris.

Though I might very well treat you as a Spy (replyed Cyrus) since you are found in a disguis'd habit during the Treaty: Yet I will not, but will let you have a Coach to carry you where you please. Aripithes at first refus'd this last favour, but at last perceiving he was not able to ride, he was forc'd to accept of it: And Cyrus sent immediately to seek a Coach and Chyrurgeons, and left one to helpe his Squire to hold him up, for he was not able to stand by himselfe. Spitridates at parting gave him a very civil Complement, unto which the other answer'd with a kind of surly civility. After which, this Prince follow'd Cyrus, to perswade him unto his opinion concerning the ground which they had view'd.

In the mean time, since he had receiv'd a little hurt in his left arme, Cyrus would see him dress'd, though Spitridates would not have him: and since the armes of that Prince were cut in severall places, Cyrus sent him those rich Armes which he wore the first time when the forty Cavaliers conspir'd to kill him, and since wore upon severall great occasions. Since they were very rich and magnificent, the Present was worthy both of the giver and Receiver.

In the mean time, the five dayes of Treaty being expired, and Anacharsis had effected nothing, this sage Scythian was forc'd to leave Thomyris unto her bad destinies, and came unto Cyrus. But it is observable, that before he departed, he understood how that Queen hearing how Aripithes was return'd wounded, and that he went from the Camp with a design of killing Cyrus, she was so incens'd against Page 163 him, that she command'd him to retire; for though she much complain'd against Cyrus, yet she did not wish his death: so as not being able to hide her angry resentments: and Aripithes hearing of them, he was so griev'd, that he dy'd within twenty four hours after. But Thomyris was not long in this mind; for so it chanc'd, that on the last day of the Treaty, Cyrus writ unto Mandana, and sent her Letter by a disguis'd servant, to the end Gelonide might convey it unto that Princesse: This Letter in lieu of coming to the hands of Gelonide, did fall in]to the hands of Thomyris; for the servant being stopped by the way by some accident or other, he came not to the place where the Queen was untill an hour af]ter the Treaty ended: but it did so perplex the heart of this Princesse, that hatred took the place of Love: For Cyrus thinking this would be the last Letter which he should write unto Mandana, before the end of the Warre, which could never end before either his death, or the liberty of his Princess, he writ it with un-imaginable passionateness concerning her, and with extream bitterness concerning Thomyris.

The truth is, all the most tender expressions which the most zealous love could invent, were included within this Letter, which came to the hands of this Queen whose spirits were so much incensed at it, that if Cyrus had promised her some eternall affection, and had by this given her some testimonies of his inconstancy, she could not possibly have been more incensed against him: So as thinking upon nothing but Warre and Revenge, and all her Forces being in as good a posture as she could wish, she prepared for a Combate.

Ariantes on his side, seeing that a Battle must be fought to decide this great buisnesse upon which depended the happinesse or misery of so many illustrious per]sons, began to think upon all manner of stratagems which might ruine Cyrus: and finding that it would be a marvellous disadvantage to him, if Thomyris could get the Fort of Sauromates into her power, because then if the Army of Cyrus were engaged on this side the woods, he had no place of retreat in case he were olvercome: and therefore he imagined all manner of wayes how to bring this great design about. Cyrus on the other side being much perplexed that Thomyris by her frivolous Negotiations had retarded his designs, he did begin to think how he might by his diligence gayn that time which had been lost: Yet he had the satisfaction of being commended by the wise Anacharsis, who declared him free from all the sadd consequences of this War. After which, he went unto the Queen of Pontus, and the Princess of Armenia at the Fort of Sauromates.

In the mean while, how desirous soever both sides were of fighting, yet it was a long time before any assaults were given; because each side watching for advan]tage, and unwilling to hazard a definitive Battle rashly, they would not fall on without some appearance of it.: But in the interim of all these great preparations, Mandana lived in such a generall ignorance as that she knew nothing: For neillther the Princesse of Bythinia, nor Istrina, nor Arpasia did see her, so as she had no other consolation but what she had from Doralisa and Martesia. Yet she had so much satisfaction as to imagine, that if things went not on the side of Cyrus, they would tell her: For Thomiris and Ariantes used always to let her know the worst, but concealed the best news from her: And since it was many dayes since they told her any thing, she concluded by infallible consequence, that the side of Cyrus had the advantage: Thus her hopes that Cyrus would be victorious, and she ere long released, did afford her soule much tranquility.

But at last, after long watching for advantages on both sides, both Cyrus and Thomyris resolved to give Battle: And though Cyrus could have wished a little longer delay, because he knew that a very great force vv]hich Ciaxares sent him vv]as very nigh: Yet since he never in his life refused fighting vv]hen any occasion vv]as offered, he could not novv recoil: so as every one in both Armies prepa]ring for a Fight, one might have seen the very same spirit, and the same zeale in tvo huge Armies. On the one side, Thomyris and Ariantes omitted nothing which might conduce to obtaine the victory. On the other side, Cyrus and Man]danes were as vigilant and circumspect as possible, to vanquish and release Man]dana. Myrsiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Hydaspes exasperated by interest of Page 164 Love, they did contribute their whole assistance unto Cyrus, and to get the vi]ctory: And the last of these had a new reason to desire it, for he understood that Meliantes was in the Tents Royall, and that Lycander did not know him to be his Rivall.

Moreover, Artamus, Tygranes, Spitridates, and all the rest of the brave Ones in this Army, prepared themselves for victory or death. But though Cyrus at other times when he was ready to give battell, was wont to be all joy, yet now his spirits were not so tranquill as he was wont, and he perceived in himself such a secret me]lancholly (the cause of which he knew not) as seemed a bad Omen unto him. Yet he did dissemble it as much as he could, and tempered his sad thoughts with reason: Indeed, he was as active as if he resented no such thoughts, yet that day he would weare only a common suit of Arms; but as for Spitridates, he wore those which Cyrus gave him, and he wore them with so good a grace, and so noble a Aire, as he was much more resembling that illustrious Hero; Indeed many souldiers who knew not that Cyrus had given those rich arms unto Spitridates, did take him for Cyrus, and were deceived by that marvelous resemblance which was between them. How]ever, though Cyrus had only common Arms, yet he had so high an Air, and such a Princely command, that it was easie to see, that it was his admirable presence which was his only ornament, and which attracted the looks of all about him: But at last after Orders were given in both Armies, some certain spies which Cyrus had in the Army of Thomyris, returned unto his, who acquainted him that in the morning, there had been a combate betwixt two strangers who were with that Queen, the name of the one was Meliantes, and the other Lycander; that the first had killed the second, and that the Conquerour was still in favour with Thomyris, and would be in the battell, relating afterwards, all they knew concerning the Enemies Army.

Hydaspes being then with Cyrus, heard what the spies said, for he commanded them to speak aloud before Hydaspes, so as being exceedingly grieved that this amiable Rivall was not killed by the Ravisher of Arpasia, he made a hundred vows to meet him in the battell, and to have a particular combat with him in the generall battell, for he alwaies had observed that Meliantes was so much in Arpasia's favour that he could not choose but be jealous, yet since that place was not fit for the expressing the resentments of his Soule, hee said not a word unto Cyrus, whose mind was so taken up with desires of vanquishing, that he took no notice of Hydaspes.

In the mean while, the fatal moment destined for the beginning of this bloody battle being come, the two Armies which were drawn up, almost with equal advan]tage, advanced; and as soon as ever they were within bow shot, a cloud of Arrows began to dusk the Air: But when their Quiers were emptied, and that all their other Engins had done their Execution, the sword undertook to decide this great and terrible dayes work, which did nothing resemble the battells which Cyrus formerly sought: For in other battells he alwaies fought his Troops in order, but in this he could not possibly, and there was such a confusion in both Armies, that the souldiers hardly knew their own colours.

However, the fight was sharp and bloody, and there was such an animosity between the Combatants, as there appeared the same cruelty in both of them. As for Cyrus, his actions were this day so prodigious, that were they particularized, they would be incredible, for in the midst of this great disorder, where death looked grim on all sides, he helpt the feeble, rallied those which fled, and going continually from place to place, it may be said, that he run through all the dangers of the battell, yet his care could not bring him to meet with Ariantes, but he killed the valiant Octomasades with his own hand, and he made his way through all places where his sword did glitter: Indeed, this great Prince being seconded by the valour of Mazares, and so many valiant Commanders and brave men, that he had put his Enemies so to rout, as the victory had been his without dispute, Tho]myris and Ariantes had been ruin'd, and Mandana released, had it not been for one peice of ill news which he received. For as he was in this glorious condition, intelligence was brought him, that Andramites had surprized the Fort of Sauromates, that he had sent the Queen of Pontus, and the Princess of Armenia, unto the Page 165 Tents Royall; that Anacharsis and the King of Hyrcania, were in the Fort very slenderly guarded; that Andramites told Meriontes that he was free, and that Meriontes told him again, he would not be so, but would return unto Cyrus as soon as he could take horse, for he would not be delivered by any hand, but that which had saved his life: Adding, that Andramites was with his Troops, between the Fort and the Wood which was burnt.

This news doubtless did much trouble Cyrus, but since the bringers of it, had told it confusedly unto all they met, it had such ill consequences, that it intirely changed the destiny of the battell, for things were told and heard in tumult, they are never rightly understood, so as passing in a short time from mouth to mouth, in the very midst of the Combat, the tale was so changed, that it was told the Van-guard, that the Rearguard was routed, that the Army of Cyrus was set about on all sides, and that Thomyris her self in person, was at the Fort of Sauromates, to hin]der Cyrus in his retreat.

This false news did so blunt the valour of the souldiers, that from hopes of being Conquerours, they fell to fears of being conquered, and indeed were like to be so; for they were so full of Pannick fears, that the flying Enemy perceiving it, did rally again, and the destiny changing, they shrunk before those whom they put to rout: Spitridates, who was gon to the left wing, after this ill news was known, he was so compassed by those whom fears had most put into confusion, that he did what he could to infuse courage into them, and to bring them to fight, but he could not, yet he reassembled a little body, with which he kept his ground, but it was so inconsiderable in comparison of that vast body which was before him, that as brave as he was, he thought it impossible to retreat without dishonour, but this Prince wear]ing those rich arms which Cyrus had formerly so gloriously worn, he thought him]self obliged to do something extraordinary, and therefore he encouraged those whom he had rallied to second him in his design, and by his example, to move those who fled to return, so as in this dangerous occasion he did things worthy his resem]blance of Cyrus.

In the mean time, Ariantes being in the head of those who were before Spitri]dates also knowing those arms, and being mistaken by the resemblance between Cyrus and that Prince, he verily thought him to be his Rivall, so as he made to]wards him, and assaulted him with such vigour, that it was apparant, he was per]swaded; if he could overcome this terrible Enemy, he should overcome the whole Army.

On the other side, Spitridates seeing himself so hotly set upon, did defend him]self in such a heroick manner, that if the little body in which he was, had been a]ble to held up against that which Ariantes commanded, he had not been overcom, but being extreame]ly nequall in number, they were intirely broken, do what Spi]tridates could, who was already wounded in severall places. However, since he was parted from Ariantes, by the tumult in the combat, he thought that he might retreat; but as he was endeavouring it, he was compassed about you with fifteen or twenty Massagettans or Gelons, who thinking him to be Cyrus, and thinking to end the war by ending his life, never endeavoured to take him prisoner, least his valour should then become master of theirs, but falling all at once upon Spitridates, this great and unfortunate Prince, did see himself in most ex]tream danger: However, though he had none with him but a very few of his own men, yet he encouraged them to do as he did, and indeed they did so bravely second him, that if a Javelin which run him through, had not made him fall from his horse, he had been able to have vanquished his vanquishers. But as soon as this illustrious Prince was fallen, some of his men coming to him; and desiring to stay with him: No, no my companions, (said he unto them,) you must not stay with me, for it is here where I must dye, but it is not here where you must vanquish, and get that Princess whom I adore, out of the power of the cruell Thomyris: These generous words being heard by the enemy, they wer more perswaded that Spitridates was Cy]rus, for they thought that the Princess whom he spok of was the Princess Mandana, though Spitridates doubtless meant Araminta, whom he heard Andramites had sent unto the Tents Royall, so as falling upon him all at once, they killed him out right though his men did as much as men could do to hinder them, and then began such Page 166 <1 page duplicate> Page 167 <1 page duplicate> Page 164 <1 page duplicate> Page 165 <1 page duplicate> Page 166 a resolute combate for his body, as never was the like, for since a report went a]mong the souldiers which fled, that Cyrus was on that side, some of them rallied, and fought with more courage to revenge their Prince whom they thought dead, and to defend his corps, than they had done to obtain the victory. But Ariantes side being the stronger, they carried away this illustrious Corps, and slew all those who made resistance: All this while, Cyrus seeing the generall terror in all his Troops, and not being able to be every where, he sent about his friends severall ways, to try if they could infuse heart into them, whilst he endeavoured to rally those who were about him.

He sent therefore Mazares on one side, and Artamus on another, and likewise he dispersed Intaphernes, Atergatis, Indathersis, Hydaspes, and all the brave ones of his Army, so as sending them away one after another, as he thought most expedient, there stayed not one man of command with him, and there remained none but his very self to rally all his dispersed Troops. Indeed he assembled toge]ther a few scattered souldiers, and drawing them into a little body, he did not only hold a great one in play, but routed them, and killed abundance with his own hand: Those whom he sent unto severall places to do the like, did so well obey him, that they each of them rallied a little body of men, with which they slew abundance of their Enemies, so as they did not loose so many men in the last battell which Cyrus won, as they did at this time. Yet since all these petty divisions did fight only partic]ular combats, and did not joyn, Cyrus could not see any hopes of vanquishing; but however, he had hopes of not being overcome, if the noise of his death had not been divulg'd amongst the Enemy; who taking fresh hearts, and crying out unto those they fought with, that Cyrus was dead did strike a great terror in those places where that Prince was not, so as night coming on, the Massagettans remained upon the field as Masters.

Cyrus seeing himself in this pittifull condition, bethought himself how he might, not fall into the hands of Thomyris, so that he with only twenty did most prodigiously dis-engage themselves from at the least two hundred who had set them about; but in his retreat, he met with another body of men, in the head of whom was the young and valiant Meliantes, who 'was seeking all about for Hydaspes, and could not meet with him; so as to comfort himself by the defeat of those he met withall, he fell upon them. Since his number was very unequal, and he a brave man without cruelty, he offered to give them quarter if they would lay down Arms. But Cyrus being unaccustomed to receive any such favours from any with Arms in their hands, he answered them only with blows, and defended himself in such an heroick manner, that he stood the last of his own men in the midst of his Enemies without one wound. But since his courage made Meliantes admire him, he charged his men not to kill him, but to take him, which they could hardly have done, if the sword of Cyrus had not broken.

But at last, when he saw himself single and without arms, he did not make any vain resistance; but still preserving his Judgment sound in the midst of all these dangers, he bethought himself how to render himself unto some Officer who was not a Massagettan, least he should be known, and having observed by the commands which Meliantes gave, that he had the tone of an Assyrian, and that he was no subject unto Thomyris, he rendred himself unto him.

Meliantes thinking himself obliged unto him for his choice, he promised that he should be used according to the merit of his valour, and to testifie (said hee unto him) how much your bravery hath purchased my esteem, though it be almost night, yet you shall not be bound as other prisoners use to be, only I require your word that you will not escape.

Cyrus considering his condition, accepted his civility, and Meliantes desiring him to ride next him, and hearing a retreat sounding in all quarters, he took the way towards the camp, but in the way, Oh Heavens, what did the miserable Cyrus think? what sorrows did he not suffer? for he saw his army defeated, he saw himself a prisoner and he could not hope to pass as unknown long Yet since he unto whom he had rendred himself did not know him, he had some comfort, and carried himself so well all the way that he confirmed him in his intention of treating him well.

And indeed, though Cyrus had that day very meane Armes, and did Page 167 not affect to speak like a man of any extraordinary parts, yet Meliantes after he saw him in his Tent, did make no question, but that he was a prisoner of some great quality, and remembering how long he himself had been a prisoner when he was taken by the Troops of Cyrus in Assyria, he would render the same civillities which he received: For since Hydaspes did imprison him only out of jealous resentments, he was treated very favourably, so that Meliantes being charmed with the valour, the Spirit, the handsom Presence, and the constancy of his prisoner, he carried him into his Tent, and caused all his men to be as respective to him as to himself. Nor was he (out of a generous resentment) very forward in divulging what he thought of his prisoners quality untill he knew it a little better, intending not to discover it unto Thomyris, if it proved to be as great as he did imagine it: Unless his quality was such as might oblige that Queen to put Arpasia into his powder; for since he had no dependance upon Thomyris, he was resolved to do his prisoner no ill office, if the interest of his Love did not oblige him unto it: Thus Cylrus not knowing any thing, Meliantes was thinking how he might best keep his prisoner from being known who he was.

In the mean time, Cyrus being ignorant of Meliantes his thoughts, and judgling by his Air, and Physiognomy, that happily he might be in Love, he thought it expedient to tell him in obscure tearms, that the interest of a passion which was predominate in his soule required that he should be unknown in the Camp of Thomyris, and that afterwards he should conjure him to do him that good Office.

And indeed Cyrus did express himself so sweetly, that he obliged Meliantes to promise him any thing. And though Meliantes knew very well that his Prisoner would not discover all his secret; yet since he doubted not but that he was in love, he added compassion unto his esteeme; and expressed himself so generously unto Cyrus, that this great Prince was charmed with his virtue. Yet the soule of Cy[rus] was not so tranquill, as to set his mind wholly upon any thing which did not relate unto the present state and interest of his love: But when he remembered all the Victories which he had gotten, and considered the pittifull condition wherein he was, he could not choose but wonder at the fickleness of fortune, and grieve for his owne misery.

For indeed it now depended wholly upon Meliantes, whether he would present him unto Thomyris, or put him into the hands of his Rivall; nor did he know whether his whole Army was defeated: whether Mazares was dead or taken Prisoner, and whether so many Princes as were his friends, might rally his Troops, and joyn them with that puissant relief which Ciaxares sent him, nor did he know how they could joyne, if it was true that Andramites had considerable forces between the Fort and the Wood. But his greatest perplexity was the thought that they would presently acquaint Mandana with his defeat: So as fearing least the alteration in his fortune should work upon that heart of that Princess, he suffered unexpressable torments: And he thought his condition so deplorable, that he believed the answer of the Sibill would presently be fulfilled, and that he should perish by the cruelty of Thomyris.

But whilst he was in all these melancholly cogitations, all his men were in a strange inquietude. For since he appeared no where, they thought him either dead or taken Prisoner. So as never was such a dolefull murmure heard.

Cressus, Mazares, Myrsiles, Artamus, Gdbrius, Gadates, Intaphernes. Atergatis, Indathersis, Hidaspes, and all those who had any command in the Army, en[deavoured] to perswade their Souldiers, that Cyrus, was not dead, least after they had rallied them, they should run away againe: Likewise they did not think it expedient, to say that they thought him a Prisoner, nor to send unto the Camp of Thomyris to enquire of him; least if he should be there unknown unto the enemy. So that all these Princes said, that Cyrus seeing in what a bad condition the Army was, was gone to the Auxiliaries which Ciaxares sent, so that being in the head of a fresh Army he might vanquish his vanquishers: Adding, (since Spiritidates appeared not) that they were both gone together: For the truth was, they knew not what was become of either.

However Chrisantes and Feradas who were grieved beyond measure, that nothing Page 168 was known concerning their illustrious Master, they disguised themselves in the habit of Massagettans, to the end they might the better passe through the enemies Camp, and heare what they said of him.

Thus, whilst Cressus and Mazares by the consent of all the Princes did take upon them the command of the Rallied Troops, untill it was known what was become of Cyrus; These two faithfull servants, went not only unto the Camp of Thomyris, but also unto the Tents Royall which were very neare, whether they understood the Queen was gone, presently after the Battell: Indeed, a chance happened, which caused this incensed and amorous Queen to take that Resolution. For since those who killed Spiritidates took him for Cyrus, and since one of those who commanded the Gelons in that Army, had a most feirce and cruell soule, he had cut off the head of that unfortunate Prince; and being followed by his companions, who carried the Corps upon crossed Lances, he did present it unto Thomyris, whose mind being extreemly incensed against Cyrus, by reason of the last letter which she saw, she received this sad present, in a most inhumane manner. Yet at the first apprehension, she thought to turne away her eyes from such a terrible object, but recollecting all her rage and the animosity of her heart, she beheld it afterwards, without any symptoms of compassion, though her mind was much perplexed. And the more when this Captaine who presented this glorious victime, told her the words which Spiritidates spake, when being fallen, he bad his men go away, because that was the place where he was to dye, but not where they were to vanquish and deliver the Princesse whom he adored, by forcing her out of the power of Thomyris. Then did her hatred double. For thinking this to be the head of Cyrus, those last words did so revive and augment her choller, that stifling all thoughts of love, hu[m]anity and compassion, she was inflamed with jealousy, hatred and fury, she re[nounced] all the tendernesse of her sex, and dignity of her birth, and yet for an umbrage of her inhumanity, she seemed to be much troubled: So that without a word of her Passion, she began again to speak of Cyrus as the murderer of her sonne, and as a Prince who to satisfie the gust of his ambition, did quench it with Rivers of blood: She gave the Captaine of the Gelons as many thanks as if he had wonn her a hundred Battles, she made him huge promises of large recompences, and commanded him to follow her with that illustrious head in his hand. So that after she had sent to acquaint Ariantes (who was rallying his Troops which were much weaker then those of the Rivall) that Cyrus was dead, & that he should stay in the Camp, she took horse being attended with her Guard, and two hundred Archers, this Captaine going behind her, and carrying the head which he had presented: But the observation was, that those who saw this Queen ride in this cruell man[ne]r, were all most horribly ashamed at her, and pittied him whom they imagined dead. For all the Massagettans did so well know, that the Warr which Cyrus made was just, and that Thomyris was in the wrong, that they were much grieved at this triumphant Tragedy.

However since it was night, and since shee had found out a way to persecute Mandana, though she could not be revenged upon Cyrus in a manner so sensible, she would stay untill it was day to act a piece of cruelty wherein she hoped for great delight. So that commanding that a great Bason should be filled with blood, and set in the plaine which was before the Tents and especially before Atandanas whether they had brought Ariminta and the Princess Onesile, she came thither the next morning with all her Guard, and all those who were in the Tents Royall. Yet she had passed away the night in most terrible and strange apprehensions, for sometimes, the image of Cyrus living, made her pity his death, and sometimes the constant love of that Prince unto Mandana made her rejoyce he was not living, yet it was a most restless and tumultuous joy, which left such smal signes of delight in her eyes, that nothing was to be seen in them, but signes of fury and rage.

Thomyris was that day dressed, as when she went into the Warres, and she held a staffe of command in her hand which she alwayes used with a menacing action, though she had no enemy neare to fight with all. Yet to be more sensibly revenged upon Cyrus in the person of Mandana, This incensed Queen caused the Tent of that most excellent Princess to be set open with whom was Araminta, Page 169 One sile, Doralisa, and Martesia, to the end they might behold the saddest spectacle that their eyes could look upon.

Since it was not known, what Thomyris intended to do with this great Bason full of blood, which she had caused to be set before Mandanas Tent, curiosity had flocked together a huge croud of all manner of people, who all talked of what was intended, with much incertainty.

But at last, Thomyris coming out of her Tent, and the Captaine of the Gelons following her with the supposed head of Cyrus, all the people fixed their looks up[on] this sad object. And Mandana and Ariminta looking on as the rest did, had thoughts which others had not, for though this head was disfigured, yet it kept a great resemblance of Cyrus. So that Mandana not questioning, but that it was the head of Cyrus whom she loved with a most pure and innocent affection; her sorrows did surprise her in so strange a manner, that after she had made a most dolefull scrike, her voice failed her upon a sudden: As for Ariminta, though she could not suspect that this was the head of Spiritidates, because she knew not why Thomyris should be so cruell against him, yet the death of Cyrus, the griefe of Mandana, and the cruelty of Thomyris did much move her.

However, this incensed Queen, after she had caused the head to be shewed unto the people, and told them in few words that now Peace was like to ensue since she could shew them the head of him who had caused the Warre and murdered her son she commanded him who held this illustrious head, to plunge it three times in this Bason full of bloud; To the end, (said she being transported with fury and jealousy) that he whose thirst of it could never be quenched whilst he lived, yet he might have enough of it when he was dead.

This terrible command was no sooner given, but this Gelon Captaine whose nature was cruell, did plung this head, three times in the Bason of blood, and took it out againe in such a condition as caused horreur in all those who had any huma[nity] in them.

This sad spectacle dejected the eyes of all the Spectators, and the cruell Thomyris her self, could not choose but turne away her head, lifting up her eyes towards Heaven, rather as cursing then imploring the gods. But as for the sad Mandana, when she saw the blood run down from all parts of this head as she lost her speech by the first sight, so she lost her sight and understanding at the second; and swoun[ded] between the Armes of Doralisa and Martesia.

In the meane time, Chrysantes and Feraulus comming just as this cruel Executioner did plung this head into the Bason of bloody, they shared with Mandana in her sorrows, for since they did not see the Armes of Cyrus, they thought it to be the head of their illustrious Master, Feraulus transported with griefe and rage, would needs throw himself into the Press, and take it out of their hands, or else be killed: But Chrysantes with holding him by shewing him Mandana, and telling him that he would do Cyrus better service by his life, he had not time to do it; for as soon as the Capitaine had plunged the head three times in the Bason, The cruell Thomyris perceiving the horrour, which this action caused in the faces of all her people, she commanded it to be carryed unto the body from whence it was sevelred, and both carryed into a Tent untill further orders: After which, causing Mandanas Tent to be shut, she returned to her own, with such rage and tumultuous thoughts, that she hated her self no lesse then she did Mandana.

The end of the second Book.

ARTAMENES, OR, THE GRAND CYRUS. THE TENTH AND LAST PART, AND THIRD and last BOOK.

THOMYRIS was no sooner returned into her Tent, but this sad object which struck horrour into all the beholders, and had made some impression in her owne heart, did so sting her conscience and spirits, that she knew not what she did, or what she should do. Indeed, now and then she thought that this action of Cruelty was but a poor piece of revenge: and her mind passing from object to object, she fancied the Illustrious Artamenes, as he was the first time she gave him Audience as Embassador from Cyaxares: and considering also the pittifull condition she did now see him in; she grew pale, and trembled for horrour, and some sparks of compassion enltring into her heart whether she would or no, they revived in it some thoughts of tendernes and love, which did more cruelly torment her then all her fury, her rage, and her jealousy: How Thomyris (said she) is Cyrus dead whom thou didst passionately love? and canst thou see his head severed from his body without excessive sorrow? Couldst thou find a heart to command it to be plunged in a bason full of blood? Fie, fie, thou dost merit his hatred, but art worthy of the Epethite of cruell Thomyris, which he gave thee in his Last Letter, and with his expiring breath. Yes, yes, inhumane Princess that thou art, is it pitty he should be unfaithfull unto that Princess whom he loves; thou dost deserve he should be as cruell unto thee, as thou art unto him. Though thou dost keep Mandana in thy power, yet he did let the point of his Sword fall when thou didst meet him in the Page 171 wood of the Sauromates: Though he might easily have killed thee, yet thou triumphest in his death: Yes merciless Thomyris, though this Prince was infinitely in love with Mandana, yet he would not deprive thee of life: Thou who hast vaunted to have loved him better then ever any else knew how; canst thou look upon him dead, without any resentments of sorrow? and hast thou nothing else to do but invent such Cruelties as will make thee odious unto thy very selfe, and all the world? After this, Thomyris being silent, she had a thousand severall imaginations upon this adventure: and she did so particularly call to memory all that ever Cyrus had done or said in her Court, when he carried the name of Artamenes, that her heart beginning to melt, she grieved for that Prince, whose death did at the first news of it fill her full of joyes; and she grieved with more apprehensive sorrow, then ever her soule was before sensible of. And though as oft as she remembered his last words, she could not grieve for the death of him who pronounced them: Yet Love being the most prevailing passion of her heart, she sometimes thought that she saw Cyrus sensible and living, yet was an object lesse grieving, then Cyrus was in that condition which she saw him. So as tormenting her selfe all manner of wayes that an amorous heart could be tormented, she was as great a sufferer as any could be. Her most sensible perplexity was, that knowing how Ariantes loved Mandana, she thought that she had not liberty enough to treat her ill, and to be revenged of her, both for the death of Cyrus, her own cruelty, and for her own misfortunes: So as her soule having so many torments to endure at once, that for some days she was unable to order the generall affairs of her Estate, but sent all those who came unto her about any business, unto the Prince her brother: And that you may see the inequality of her thoughts; for all this act of cruelty struck horrour into all beholders, yet she commanded that all due rights should be done unto the Corps of Cyrus, and that they should be performed as not coming from her orders.

But to return unto Mandana, and to say something of her resentments, when she saw the bloody head of Spitridates, which she thought to be Cyrus, be pleased to know that she continued so long in her swoond, that this sad Scaene was not onlly ended when she recovered out of it, by the cares of Araminta, Onesile, Doralisse, and Martesia: But the Tent was shut, and all the people dispersed before she recovered her sight and speech; when she first opened her eyes, she turned away her head and shut them again, for her imagination being still filled with that terrible object which caused her swoounding, she thought that she saw it still.

But after her eyes were a little settled, and her reason recollected, she knew that she saw nothing but people mourning, with faces and eyes all swelled with teares, both for her grief, and for the death of him who caused it: Indeed, the unfortunate Araminta not knowing what a sad share she had in this fatal losse which thus grieved Mandana, she was most sensibly troubled, and yet she endeavoured to give all the consolation she was able, not knowing that she her selfe stood most in need of it: And therefore beginning to speak; In the name of the Gods Madam (said she unto Mandana) make your constancy and patience appear, rouze up your selfe, and consider, that if you should kill your self with grief, your death and his perhaps would be without revenge: but if on the contrary you endeavour to live, all Asia will take Arms for your liberty, and for revenge of Cyrus his death.

Alas (said the sad Mandana) how hard a thing is it to follow your counsel? and therefore Madam (continued she, beginning to flow in tears, which the excess of her sorrow had til then restrained) before you give me any more of this advice, I pray consider whether your selfe were able to live, if you should see Spitridates in that pittifull condition which I have seen Cyrus. But oh heavens (continued she, and would not give Araminta time to answer) is it possible that I should live, and see Cyrus dead? But most illustrious Prince, though I am yet living, yet I would thou couldst know, it is against my will, and that I look upon death as the only thing desirable: Indeed, what have I else to do but to dye? For since Cyrus is dead, victory is not to be looked for. It were folly to think that any can now either revenge his death, or deliver me, since he could not release me: And though they should, what should I do in a world wherein is nothing that can Page 170 (1 page duplicate) Page 171 (1 page duplicate) Page 172 please me? I should do nothing but continually lament the death of Cyrus, and should not have so much satisfaction as to shed my teares upon his Tomb: For considering how the cruell Thomyris hath used his sacred Corps, certainly she will cause it to be torn in pieces by wild beasts: so as it is better to dye presently, then to live in such an eternall sorrow, which would brand me with ingratitude to the greatest Prince in the world; for alas, how great is my debt unto Cyrus? and therefore I were most unworthy of that constant affection he bore unto me, if I could think upon any thing but death.

After this, Mandana being silent, because a flood of tears would not suffer her to speak, Doralisa & Martesia in their turns did use all their perswasive arguments of comfort. As for Araminta, it coming into her mind, that perhaps Spitridates was also killed, her soule was so troubled that she hardly minded what Mandana said: and the certain death of Cyrus, together with the incertainty of Spitridates his life, did so disquiet her mind, that she could not continue comforting Mandana as she begun: And indeed, considering the sad condition of that Princess, it was a hard matter to find any apparant reasons by which they could perswade her that she was not in a most miserable condition: and all those about her could do nothing else but shed bitter tears, and lament the losse as well as she: All were in tears at once, and they wept as if they would all weep continually.

On the other side, Chrysantes thinking the death of his Master certain, he resolved to carry this sad news unto Mazares, and all the Princes in the Army, lest if reports of it should be divulged amongst the Souldiers any other way, they would not be so forward to revenge his death: But as for Feraulus, he would stay upon the place, to know what they did vvith the Corps of Cyrus, and to try if he could see Martesia, to lament vvith her the misfortune of this Prince, and to receive some orders from Mandana; for he imagined that since Cyrus vv as dead, they vvould not guard her so strictly.

In the mean time, it may well be said, that the supposed death of this great Conqueror did more illustrate his glory when it was known on both sides, in being lamented both by his friends and Enemies. Thomyris her selfe grieved, Ariantes did pity, though not grieve: All the Massagertans lamented him, all his friends desired no life, but to revenge his death: Mazares lamented his death, as if he had not been his Rival: All the Souldiers grieved for him as their Father, and some of those who fled from the Battle did kill themselves for very shame and sorrow, that this Prince should suffer for their basenesse.

Moreover, besides those who grieved for him out of affection, generosity, and compassion, there were many who were engaged to it by particular interests: For Intaphernes and Atergatis did see that their Princess could not be so soon released, Gabrias and Hydaspes had the same concerning Arpasia: Tigranes had the same thought for the admirable Onesile. Again, the Princesse of Bythinia, Istrina, Onesile, Arpasia, and Telagene did see that their chains would not be so soon broken: But whilst all the world were lamenting the losse of Cyrus, and were ignorant of Spitridates his destiny, Cyrus understanding by Meliantes that he was thought to be dead, he was both sad and glad of it: Yet he had many more reasons to be sorry; for when he heard of this Tragickall Ceremony of Thomyris, he verily believed that Spitridates was dead, and that they were mistaken by the great resemblance betwix him and that unfortunate Prince, so that besides his own miseries, he was extremely sensible of his losse, and Araminta's sorrows.

Moreover, he was not only sensible of Mandana's resentments, in a beliefe that he was dead, but he feared lest her resentments should prejudice him in another manner: For (said he in himselfe) though she did never change her thoughts of me, is it not to be feared that this supposed death will make her change those thoughts she had of me; for (said he out of some jealous apprehensions) one may be faithfull unto a living Lover, when one is not so unto a dead one. Few carry their affections further then to the Grave of the person loved: so as since the belief of my death may either cause her death, or cause her to be inconstant, it doth more concern me that Mandana do know that I am living, than that Thomyris should be ignorant of it: In the mean time, I know no more how to shew my self unto Mandana, then I know how to hide my selfe from Thomyris; for should I Page 173 aske Meliantes any questions concerning that Princesse, he would perhaps not only suspect who I am, but would imagine it concerns Thomyris and Ariantes to know that I am in his hands: So that Cyrus not knowing what to resolve upon, either to procure his liberty, or to let Mandana know he was not dead, his soule was in a most sad condition. Yet upon second thoughts, he conceived it expedient to say nothing unto Meliantes for some dayes, lest his too much earnestnesse should render him suspected: and that afterwards he would aske so much favour from him, as to send to one of his friends to acquaint him that he was a prisoner, and to let this friend of his come disguised into the Camp of Thomyris, and confer with him about ways for his releasement.

But during this little intervall, things went reasonable well; for Mazares after he had rallied his Troops, he entrenched them very advantageously, in expectation of those Forces which Ciaxares sent: And Ariantes having a most earnest desire to see Mandana, and still fearing the violence of Thomyris, he also entrenched his Army, and went unto the Tents Royall; for though it was victorious, yet the victory had cost him so dear, that he was not in a condition to attempt any thing against Mazares, considering the ground he had chosen for his intrenchment: Yet did he find no great satisfaction in his voyage; for he found the mind of Thomyris so incensed and unquiet, that no proposition could be made which did not vex her, especially any thing which related unto Mandana. On the other side, having visited the Princess whom he adored, he found his entertainment so bad, that he was forced to retire, and stay till her sorrows were a little over.

The truth is, she gave him such sharp Language, she charged him so oft with the death of Cyrus; she protested so earnestly that she would not live, but only to the end the King her Father, and the Prince Mazares might continue the War against Thomyris, to deliver her, and be revenged for the death of Cyrus; and she did so fully assure him, that she hated him as much as if he had killed Cyrus with his owne hands, that this Prince did think himselfe in a worse Condition by the death of Cyrus, then by his life.

In the mean time, the Princesse of Bythinia, the Princess Istrina and Arpasia were always together, not having the liberty to see Mandana, with whom Araminta and Onesile continually were: For since they were put there in the absence of Thomyris, when Andramites sent them to the Tents Royall, Ariantes durst not incense the Princess so far as to take them away: Also, since it was believed that Cyrus was dead, they did not so much care if company came to her, and the Princess of Bythinia, Istrina, & Arpasia had leave to see her in the presence of him who commanded her Guard: 'Tis true, they had no great comfort in seeing her, for they saw her so full of sorrows, as they did not think she was able to endure them long.

Again, Arpasia hearing that Licander her Ravisher was killed by an unknown hand: and understanding from Niside who was with her, that she saw Meliantes in a disguise, she made no question but it was he unto whom she was obliged for it: but she knew not whether she should be sad or glad at it; for though she did still much esteem him, yet she had still much tendernes and inclination unto Hydaspes: But since the matter was not hard to see Arpasia, and since Meliantes his passion was always in his mind, he took this opportunity, and came one morning unto Niside, unto whom he had addresse without much difficulty.

Niside being always his friend, she was glad to see him, and to heare from his own mouth, that it was he who killed Licander. He told her then how he came disguised unto this Court, lest Licander should induce Thomyris to arrest him: and that he was in hopes to rid himselfe of one Rivall by particular Duell, and of the other by generall Combate: After which, he desired Niside to help him unto the sight of Arpasia: and indeed, she being desirous to do him any favour, she procured him the opportunity without telling Arpasia, who was so surprized at the sight of Meliantes, that she knew not how she should receive him.

But since Niside had cunningly hinted unto her, that certainly it was he who killed Licander, and moreover, that Meliantes was more amiable than ever he was; her affection to Hidaspes could not hinder her from receiving a man whom she much esteemed, very civilly, especially since she had very tender thoughts of Page_174 him, before she knew of his affection unto Argelise: And though Arpasia did collour this civility to him, for that he had ventured his life in ruining her Ravisher; and though her expressions might well give him to understand that her mind was not changed, and that she could hold him in no other degree than that of friend|ship; yet for all that, she expressed her selfe, and he answered her so tenderly and passionately, that he engaged her whether she would or no to be very obliging towards him: Also he obtained leave to visite her, yet upon condition never to mention any matter of Love: so as he thought himselfe very happy in his misfortune; for since he believed Cyrus to be dead, he did not think that Hidaspes would be in any condition to dispute with him for Arpasia, so as he returned to his prisoner with much satisfaction: And as soon as he was with him, he fell into discourse upon the power of Love; he told him what was said of Thomyris, of Arianes, of Mandana, and of all their passions.

But whilst things passed thus in the Camp of Thomyris, in the Tents Royall, and in the Camp of Mazares, the news of Cyrus his death being carryed unto the Fort of Sauromates, Meriontes having no mind to be released by Andramites; and seeing Cyrus who had saved his life was dead, he would not go unto the Camp of that Prince as he intended: and being able to ride on hors-back, he besee|ched the Commander of the Fort to let him go unto the Camp of Thomyris: But it being late when he came thither, and having intimate acquaintance with Meliantes, he asked an Officer whom he did accidentally meet with, whether he knew Meliantes his Quarters, and understanding by him that he was within fifty paces of it, he went to desire a nights lodging with him. As soon as he saw Meliantes, he talked of nothing but the valour of Cyrus, of his high soule, of his generosity, and how he saved his life; how he treated him during his imprisonment, and was so high in his commendations, that Meliantes thinking to do a favour unto his Prisoner, in letting him see a man who spake so highly of a Prince whose part he took, he brought him into the Tent where he was: For though he knew that his prisoner did not desire to be known, yet he made no difficulty of bringing in Meliontes, because he could not imagine that he should know him, since they were of contrary sides, so as in this thought he carried Meriontes into the Tent where he was. At his first entrance, both Cyrus and Meriontes were so astonished, that they were not Masters of their first thoughts: Meriontes no sooner saw Cyrus, but cried out, oh Sir (said he unto him) can I believe my eyes? Is it possible that Cyrus, whom two hundred thousand men believe to be dead, should be alive? At these words, Cyrus seeing there was no longer any concealing himselfe from Meliantes, he was forced to have recourse unto those who knew him: You see valiant Mereontes (said he) how inconstant Fortune is, since she hath reduced me unto the most miserable condition of men, if you do not oblige the generous Meliantes not to discover me.

Mereontes having leasure whilst Cyrus spake, to recollect himself out of his wonder, repented of his hastinesse: But knowing Meliantes to be a man of a most generous spirit, and of quick apprehension, he saw there was no remedy. How|ever, Mereontes thinking himselfe infinitely obliged unto Cyrus who had saved his life in an heroicue way, he turned towards Meliantes, and told him, that if he did not behave himselfe towards his presence as he would have done, had he not known him, he would become his mortall Eenemy. But there was no need of all this; For Meliantes having no dependance upon Thomyris, was so glad to see himselfe master of the Destinie of the greatest Prince in the world, he interrupted Mereontes, and assured him that Cyrus needed not to feare any thing: Also a second thought coming into his mind, he conceived that it would be advantageous unto him to oblige Cyrus, since he might thereby oblige Hidaspes to cease his pretences unto Arpasia: so as continuing to speak, since Sir, I am no Subject unto Thomyris (said he unto Cyrus) only a Voluntier in her party: and since Love only brought me hither, I think it would be no blemish unto honour, if I did set you out of her power.

For my part (added Meriontes) I shall go further then you: For though I were her Subject, and in your place, knowing her in justice and cruelty, by her late horri|act, I should think it my duty to free this illustrious Prince out of her hands Page_175 and should think my self a more Enemy unto that Queen than he is; if I should give her any occasion to commit an act so base.

But generous Meliantes, whether you be subject unto Thomyris or no, you are obliged not to discover that Cyrus is in your hands. However since I am a pris|oner unto your prisoner, I will never forsake him, for since my life is his, I will loose it rather, than let him come into the hands of his Enemies. Sir, (said Meliantes) though there was no generosity in my nature, yet sure I should be so by the exam|ples which the illustrious Cyrus and you have given, and therefore Mereontes take no thought for your illustrious Conquerour, for since now I know enough of him, I am so far from thinking him my prisoner, that I and my destiny is more in his hands, than he or his in mine: Oh generous Meliantes, (said Cyrus) if there be any thing within the compass of my power, wherein I may serve you, tell me I conjure you, and to testifie that I am not unworthy of your generosity, I declare that I would not desire to oblige you unto this, but only for the interest of Mandana, and let me tell you also, (to shew that I had conceived a great opinion of you) that I have severall times intended to trust your generosity and discretion; not knowing well what thoughts you had of me. After this, Meliantes answered Cyrus in such a manner, as did evidence unto him, that he might expect any thing from him; and Mereontes shewed himself so zealous for the safety of his deliverer, that this Prince had great reason to put much confidence in the affection of two such men as had both wit and courage enough: Meliantes acquainted also Mereontes with one thing which much confirmed him in his thoughts; for he told him that Aripithes, upon whose score he became engalged on Thomyris side, did dye so much displeased against her, that he commanded severall of his servants, to tell all his Officers, that he would not have them fight any longer in her service: So as these two virtuous men finding no scruple in their design of serving the greatest Prince upon Earth, against the most unjust Princess in the world, they promised so much fidelity unto Cyrus, that he had reason to esteem himself happy in his misery, in finding two friends of so much virtue: And to oblige them unto a more affectionate devotion to him, he used all the heroicue expressions that was inventable; yet he had so high an opinion of their virtue and quality, as that he would not interest them by any ambitious hopes; but thought that in promising them his friendship, he promised them all, and he did that in as noble a manner, as if he had promised Kingdoms unto them.

After Cyrus had said all unto Meliantes and Mereontes, which he thought fit to engage them in his service, the first of these most humbly besought him, he might impart one thing which concerned him to know: And Cyrus consenting, Sir, (said Meliantes unto him) to testifie my sincerity in my promising of serving you and delivering you as soon as I can without danger, I must acquaint you that I am a Rivall unto Hydaspes whom you most dearly love, and I conjure you in consi|ration of what I will do for you, that you will stand neutrall between him and me, if ever fortune put us into a condition to dispute for the possession of Arpasia: How (said Cyrvs) are you a Rivall unto Hydaspes, and have I the misfortune to be friend unto one who is your Enemy?

After this, Meliantes told Cyrus in two words, the state of his fortune, not concealing from him that he had seen Arpasia since the battell: After which Cyrus said in desiring me to be neutrall between Hydaspes and you, generous Meliantes, you desire me much less than I will promise you: For I will faithfully promise, that if ever it be my fortune to see him again, I will conjure him to cease loving Arpasia, and will be as earnest with him, as if I were his Rivall, as well as your friend; but after this I will not promise you any more, for my humour is such, that I will never absolutely command my friends, especially in matters of Love. But I will promise you to speak both unto Gabrias and Hydaspes, as much as I can in your behalf: Then Sir, (replied Meliantes) I have no more to say, but to as|sure you that though you had denied me, yet I would have done all I could to serve you.

The worst is (added he) that it is not an easie matter to get you from this place where we now are unto your own Camp, without danger of being taken by some who may know you: Therefore it is best to go in the night time unto the Tents Page_176 Royall; for were you there, and dis-engaged from the quarters of the Army, it would be much more easie to take a compass, and meet those Auxiliaries which Cilaxares sends you, and otherwise I confess I can see no likelihood of getting you un|to your Camp.

Mereontes concurring with the opinion of Meliantes, and Cyrus apprehending much danger if he should be known, he concurred also; but the main difficulty is in going safely into the Tents Royall, and getting out: At last, Meliantes resolved to feign himself sick, and under pretence of heat, not to go in the day, but would go in a Coach close up, to avoid the humidity of the night.

Thus it was resolved, that Cyrus should go in the Coach with him, that Mel|reontes should guard them with his friends, and that they should not set out untill it was dark.

But since it was requisite that Meliantes should have a little time to counterfeit himself sick, and since Mereontes who would not forsake his illustrious Conque|rour, would not shew himself, they spent that day all three together, for it was told at the Entrance unto the Tent, that Meliantes was sick, and therefore would not be seen; so as having time enough to entertain themselves with discourse, and having now nothing to talk of but themselves, Meliantes and Mereontes were allong time in lamenting Cyrus, and admiring all the wonders of his life. But Cyrus knowing that nothing was more obliging, than to seem desirous of knowing the fortunes of friends, he was very earnest with Meliantes, to particularize the pas|sages of his life a little better to him, and afterwards he pressed Mereontes to tell him his: For truly (said he unto him) after Democedes told me your Country, after I have seen you fight, and after this your last act of generosity, I cannot choose but be very desirous to know what moved you to leave so good a country: Sir, (replied Mereontes) my adventures have been so poor, and there hath been so few extraordinary Events in my life, that indeed there is some reason to wonder, why I should voluntarily banish my self from a Country so pleasant, if it were not an ordinary thing to see that Love can make men miserable, without the power of Fortune: And there passeth many strange and extraordinary thoughts in the heart of a Lover, which seem nothing in the eyes of the world, so as he can be miserable when nothing appears unto other men why he should be so.

Alas, said Meliantes, I know this to be true by Experience: The most trans|endent person whom I adore, she esteems me, and is very friendly unto me; but for all that, I am yet the most miserable Lover in the world, since her affection unto my Rivall is of another nature, though she does nothing more unto him than un|to me.

The misery which I complain of, (replied Mereontes) seemes doubtless less than yours; but I have a soul so nice, and I do love in such a tender manner, that it is intollerable to me: since we can do nothing better (in a time when we can do nothing for the Princess Mandana) said Cyrus, then to know the life of a man who is willing to serve her, I beseech you acquaint us with it. I must tell you again Sir, (replied Mereontes) my adventures are too poor for the knowledge of such a Prince as you are, though I must confess your destiny seems to be something dubious. However Mereontes (replied Cyrus) I beseech you satisfie my desire, but to the end Meliantes may have the knowledge of your adventure, tell him in (I beseech you) few words, the customes of the country of the new Sauromates.

Mereontes in obedience unto Cyrus, told Meliantes in as consice a manner as he could, the Originall of the new Sauromates, their Lives, their Customes, and all that Democedes mentioned in Saphoes history, and began his discourse in these Termes.

THE HISTORY OF MEREONTES, AND DORINICE.

ISHALL not need to tell you Sir, that I am descended from a family which holds a considerable Rank in my country; for since Democedes hath related the history of Sapho, I am sure he hath told you of Clirantes, who is my brother, and by consequence who I am. Nor am I obliged to acquaint you with the life of our Court: For since you do know it to be gallant, that there are Judges established to determine all the differences of Lovers, and that the most admirable Sapho is very happy there, you will easily believe what I shall say.

But Sir, since the beauty and merit of one whose name is Dorinice, is the foundation of this adventure, and the cause of my misfortune, it is requisite I describe her unto you, to the end you may the better know the violence of my passion, and the greatness of my misery: Since it was not the quality of Dorinice which made me love her, I shall tell you only by the by, that her family from whence she is descended is very illustrious; but let me tell you that she is adorned with a thousand qualities which attract Love.

Indeed she is of a very handsome stature, her Complexion is rare, her Eyes black, and full of spirit; her hair is fair, her smile charming, her Teeth white, her Air both gallant, noble, and modest, and her neck and hands most fair.

Moreover, her Wit is superlative, her humour always equally the same, and there is such a just mixture of mirth and seriousness in this person, that she doth infinitely please and suite with all the world, both the melancholly and the merry. She seemed to be a very good friend, and indeed she was so, though to my sorrow I found her heart but hollow, yet it was a disguised hollowness: For when one first sees her, and sees the freeness of her looks, her civility and sweetness, one would say, that for the time he had made a far progress into her soul, and yet one should not be one step further in her favour at the end of three months, than they are at the end of three dayes, and the like at the end of three years, all imaginable services and courtship will not work upon her heart.

Then Sir, I must tell you, that though we have but one City in our State, yet Dorinice was eighteen years of age before I ever spoke unto her: For besides the bigness of our City, which is so large, that one may easily be long there and not particularly known, so it was, that several trifling passions did take up many of my young dayes, and as chance would have it, I fell into a Caballe opposite unto that of Dorinices Mother, so as it may be said, I knew her and I knew her not. But since several changes chanced, which absolutely dis-engaged my heart, I chanced one day to meet this fair one in an assembly at the Queens. Thinking I should much spite those Ladies whom I had broke off withall, if I did entertain Dorinice, whom I knew they loved not, I began discourse with her.

Page 178 Thus I entertained her the first time more in spite to others than to please my self, not but that I found much pleasure in her company, for since she was glad to see I had quitted the Ladies whom she loved not, she received me better then when I was in favour with her Enemies, and yet she chid me when I began to tell her, that I thought my self very happy in her company. Before I give any direct answer unto your Civility, Sir, replied she, and smiled, I beseech you give me leave to examine a little, whether I should take you as a Spy or as a desertor of your friends, or as one who hath changed sides. Oh most lovely Dorinice (said I and interrupted her) I am neither a Spy nor a Desertor of my friends, but I have changed my side with so much reason, that you cannot in any justice blame me; yet least you should have an ill opinion of me, I will not speak any ill of your Enemies, but since I have so much good to speak of you, time is better employed in that then in the other: Were you to talk long, replied she, and smiled, you would both trouble me and your self, for I have so many faults and so few good qualities, that you would find it, Sir, a hard task to talk of such things only as should please me: But since, Sir, it is probable you will tell me more of my good then my bad qualities, I shall hope you will not tell me any thing which will displease me: At the least I am sure, Madam (said I unto her) I shall say nothing but truth, when I tell you that you are the most fairest and loveliest person in the world.

As Dorinice was ready to reply, they came to take her out to dance, so as all that night I could not talk any more with her. But since she had infinitely pleased me, and since I observed that I had sufficiently vexed those Ladies whom I intended to spite, I went the next day with one of my friends unto the house of Dorinices Mother, whose name was Elicrate, and, Sir, I was so much taken both with the Mother and the Daughter, that I repented I had been so long unacquainted with them, for the truth was, their society was infinitely more pleasing then that I had quitted; for those Ladies whom I had left off were persons who admitted all sorts of men without exception or choice, which questionless goes against the grain of those who have nice and delicate spirits, and not at all advantageous unto such as frequent them: But, Sir, it was otherwise in the house of Elicrate, for almost none frequented it, but men of excellent parts; and Dorinice had such an art of wearying those who were not well accomplished, that if any such came once there, they were sure not to come twice; and yet there was always much company with her, because there was men more of excellent parts in our Court: And, Sir, you must know that this Lady, though never capable of love, nor ever will as long as she lives, yet is she the greatest fondling in friendship that is in the world, for she has friends of all sorts, and the wonder is, she gets them every day, and loses none, and does so well keep all such secrets as are intrusted to her, that she never injures any, but as far as she is able, is ready to do any service for those whom she hath promised any place in her friendship: Yet as I said in the beginning of my discourse, she hath this particular quality, that she hath set bounds about her heart, beyond the limits of which none whosever can ever go; for one shall be as high in her favour at three months as they can be in three years.

Dorinice being as I have described her very amiable and engaging at the first, I thought my self the happiest man alive in her acquaintance; and I presently perceived, that my thoughts of her might be phrased Love, and not at all Friendship: yet I thought my self not at all the more miserable; for since I knew that I had some share in her esteem, and that she promised me her friendship, I thought that I might pretend unto her love: But to carry it according to the common Maximes of all prudent Lovers; I did not declare my self at the first, but stayed untill her heart was a little engaged, before I openly told and divulged that I was in love with her. However I was very assiduous in my Visits, and courted her with all imaginable submissions, for the friendship which men held with her did exact from them the same services almost that Love did, and I was so happy in my behaviour, that in a short time she did me the favour to admit me into the catalogue of her friends; yet I must confess, this rank did not altogether please me; for since she was ranked higher in my heart, I could not be contented with that rank which I had in hers. The truth is, I flattered up my self with hopes, that as soon as she knew I loved her, Page 178 she would then distinguish me from the rest; and though I know she made open profession never to admit of any Gallantry: yet as one is apt to flatter ones self with what they love so I thought that I might happily be excepted out of that general rule: So as not being able to endure this cruel uncertainty, I resolved to discover my passion unto her, and I resolved upon it, after I had spent a whole day with her in extreme melancholy; for I was persuaded that all her friends would at other times be so much about her, that I could not find a fitter opportunity: So as I staying the last with her, I began to speak unto her, and desired her to tell me whether I was as much in her heart that day as I had been in her Chamber? Doubtless you are, replied she, as all my friends are: Oh, Madam (said I) there is no justice I should be thronged with such a croud of friends in your heart, since you are single and alone in mine; and therefore, Madam, I must either be excluded out of your heart, or else all those men you croud with me in it, must; for otherwise I must confess, that I cannot be at any rest there: Alas, Madam, continued I, and would not give her time to answer me, it is extreme injustice to mix me with them, for I am not of their rank, nor are my thoughts like theirs: Indeed, I am so far from entertaining you (as some of them do) with my ambition, that I do declare the height of my ambition I: to be loved by you; I am so far from telling you of any Intrigues and Caballs (like theirs) that I will never be of any, in which you are not: I have so little to do with domestic business and cares, that I never think of any but what you have caused in me, and so far am I from talking of any love which I bear unto others. that I can talk of nothing but my love to you: and therefore Madam, I beseech you judge whether it be just you should rank me amongst such men as nothing resemble me? Doubtless it is not (replied she and smiled) for if you be such as you say, I must exclude you from my heart, and admit another in your room; for it were not just (added she by way of rally) that I should banish a hundred out of it, to admit of one, but much better it is to banish the one and keep the hundred, and therefore Meriontes, it is in your own choice, if you be my friend, as I ever thought you) be quiet in my heart, as all the rest of my friends are, but if you be not, take it not ill if I do exclude you: However, since I do not well understand you, nor will take so much pains as to examine whether what you say be true, I will believe you upon your word.

Since it is so, Madam, replied I, I beseech you believe that I am not only your friend, but your Lover also: for I profess, that I am not able to live in such a press of friends. Since it is so (said she) you must out of my heart, and you would do me a pleasure, if you would drive me out of yours. for since I am there alone, it is very likely considering my humour, I shall be very weary of being there. Madam, (said I unto her) you answer me with so little seriousness, that I beseech you neither look upon me as your Lover nor as your friend. Seriously, replied she, I know not well what to think; but Mereontes if you will believe me, you will content your self with the Rank of a friend, for I must ingeniously tell you, that otherwise you must loose me: were it a thing which were in my own choice (answered I) I would choose rather the quality of a friend then of a Lover; for I see all that are under that notion are well pleased, satisfied and at rest: But alas, Madam, it is otherwise with me, and though you should rank me in the first Sphere of your friends, yet I must, whether you, or I will or no, be your Lover, and be so until death; Since, Sir (replied she) you may happily be mistaken in your affection to me, and think of it more then it is, I will not yet exclude you out of my heart, but will stay a little untill you be better satisfied whether you are only of a temper in friendship something different from others, such a temper as being neither love nor friendship, yet so like unto both that either name, without injustice may be attributed unto either of them.

Oh, Madam (said I) my affection to you is not of that nature, for I am most certain that friendship hath never any desires, nor inquietudes, nor jealousy in it; Oh Mereontes (said she unto me) I plainly see that you know not what a tender and gallant friendship is, for such friends as I desire will desire to be loved, they will be quiet when they have been long absent from their friends, and be jealous to see any others about them. But, Madam (said I unto her) since you cause jealousy, and have such abundance of friends, I wonder they should Page 180 not quarrell. The more you speak of this tender and gallant friendship which I mean, Sir (replied Dorinice) the more you seem to be ignorant; for the jealousy which it inspires is not of the same nature as that which Love doth cause, is, but on the contrary, it is a sweet pleasing and ingenious Spirit, which helps discourse, which augments friendship which is never melancholick, lumpish or sad, and which produceth no other effects but such as make men more courtly, more neat, and more complaisant, such as rather makes others jealous of them then they of others: So as it may be said, that the friendship of which I speak, hath all the sweets of love without any of the bitters: Moreover (added she) I mean not such a kind of friendship, whereof there is not above two or three examples in a whole age; nor of such men as have but one only friend in the world: The first of these must be able to dye for their friends, and be as full of generosity as tender friendship: And as for the other who are so nice and delicate that they can find but one only in all the world that they think worthy of their friendship; certainly they are neither pleasing to themselves nor others: For since they cannot be merry with any but those they love, and since there is but one Phoenix in the world which they can find, certainly they find their diversions very seldom. Nor do I require that solid friendship which is found in the grave Sages of the world, for they are too cold, too dry, and too tying melancholick; Such men as these will content themselves with loving you in the depth of their heart, with serving you upon extraordinary occasions, and to speak well of you when it highly concerns you, but will never tell you that they do love you: They neglect all petty Compliments and duties of friendship, and are always so serious, that they cannot endure any mirth: yet truly my opinion is, that for the most part it is the triviall Civilities and Compliments which makes the most friendship; as for great and high Services they are so rare, as it is impossible they should both beget and nourish friendship. For ought I see, Madam (replied I) the friendship which you desire hath such a near resemblance with love, that I begin to think my self more miserable then I did imagine, and to look upon all your friends as my Rivals. Since I have friends, Sir, (replied she) who are in love with some Ladies whom you do know, you are much mistaken if you think them my Lovers: However, Madam, replied I, I would gladly know how you do rank all your friends; To begin (replied Dorinice) I must tell you, that my amorous friends are always of the lowest rank in my heart though I am often very much delighted to hear them tell their folly and fond adventures: And if you will name unto me any, I will ingeniously tell you in what degree they are in my opinion. Then tell me, Madam, said I, in what Sphere you place a friend of yours, whose Soul is so ambitious, that I think it enjoys not one minute of rest? As for him (said she) he is neither in the first nor last, but in the rank of those from whom I hear many secrets, but whom I would not trust with any of my own if I had any. You have another friend, Madam replied I. who indeed is a man of much merit, but he is so rude and fierce, that I cannot tell what sweetness his friendship should afford you, nor in what rank you can place him, for you have none who resembles him. I assure you (replied she) that this fierce friend of whom you speak, as irregular in friendship as he seems unto you, yet he is not one of the lowest rank in my heart, and should his fierceness a little mollify, he might perhaps be in the first: for he does not seem as if he were desirous one should love him, though there be nothing more like to cause it, then that.

But Madam (said I unto her) you have another friend whose name is Artimas, and who if he be not in the first rank, yet he will be ere long: For indeed he has all qualities that are requisite to please, and I do observe that he doth already very much please you: 'Tis true (said she) that he whom you mention is according to your description; for he is handsome, and he has a most excellent and pleasing wit: He writes well both in verse and prose: he can be both merry and serious, and he began his friendship in the most ingenious way in the world. He seems so tender, so sweet, so civil, and so affable, and has such an obliging way with him, as would persuade any one he loves them better than ever he did any. Moreover, he seems so extremely glad to see you; he is so hugely sensible of benefits, and so desirous to be loved, that one cannot choose but have a disposition to love him: but let me tell you withal, that whether he is so weary of his friendship, or Page 181 glutted with accustomed favours, or not sensible of them; or whether it be inconstancy in his nature, he is so un-equall in his amity, and so negligent, that though he were ungrateful, or coldly indifferent, he could not be worse than sometimes he is: Sometimes he will be a whole day together with you, and not speak a word: he will see you as if he saw you not, and will be of such a sluggish faint spirit, as he will both amaze and vex any that have any interest in him; for nothing doth more surprize him then to see men who have held a correspondence, become as cold and indifferent, as if they were not acquainted. Yet since I have not been long enough acquainted with him you speak of, to passe any definitive judgment of him; all I can say unto you is, that most infallibly he will either be in the first or last rank in my opinion: Nor can I directly tell you what place he will have in my heart, since that depends more upon him than me; for if he thus continue unequal and luke-warm, perhaps he will be in the lowest rank of my friends: and if he become as he was when I first knew him, and not so troublesome as almost all the young Gallants of the Court are, who thereby render themselves incapable of any illustrious Conquest, either in Love or friendship, then he shall be in the rank of my dearest friends.

But I beseech you Madam (replied I) tell me more positively what degree is a Cousen of mine, who useth to visit you oftner than any other except my selfe: as for him (said she) I must confesse he is in the same degree that you are, for indeed I see nothing in our friendship which doth now please me: The beginning was gallant, the sequell was obliging, and I have observed him very carefull to please me: He seems more tender and more sensible then he was at our first acquaintance: he is more glad to see me, and we divert our selves better then when we talk together, then in the infancy of our friendship. You have also another friend (replied I) who loves to talk with you in private, as if he were your Lover. And I have observed, that when any came to you, he would always make a third: He whom you speak of (replied she) is none of the least in my favour, for indeed it is one of the greatest signs of a good wit to hold particular discourse; and the greatest proof that one can give that he is pleased with his friend, is to court in private: and did you know the good will I beare unto him you mean, because I think he is better pleased when he finds me alone, then with much company, you would see that I do much prefer him before such vapourers that are out of their element, unlesse they be in a great tumultuous company, where they must speak loud before they can be heard, and who had rather be in the very worst company of a Town, then spend an afternoon in civil discourse with two or three rational persons. Yet they are the greatest loosers by it; for I am sure, that commonly such men get such ill habits as renders them lesse amiable, and lesse inclinable to love.

But Mercontes (continued she) to save you the labour of naming of any more, I will assure you that there is but you & three or four more who are in the first form of my friends: and as for the rest, I imagine you will not much care for them. Why Madam (replied I) do you think that I am satisfied with your admitting three or foure Co-equals in your heart? When you consider (replied she) that I have a hundred friends, and that I think but three or four of them your Equals, me thinks you should be well satisfied, and think your selfe happy. Alas Madam, replied I, were I only your friend, I should not be contented with it; for I am of such an humour, that I would be the first of the four; and therefore being your Lover, I cannot esteem my selfe happy in my conviction with so many friends. To testifie (replied she) that I will do all I can for you, I will tell you, that you are the first, provided you will not speak any more of your pretended love. Alas Madam (replied I) I find no great security in all this, since you have a friend who may be in the first rank, and another whose place you know not, therefore this last may exclude me and all the rest: Since I know not what is to come (answered she) I will speak of the present: And therefore all I can say unto you is, that if he of whom you speak doth continue as he hath been of late, it is not all his merit, all his wit, nor all his handsomnesse that can obtain him the first ranke of my friends: and I will tell you after, that of all those who have any place in my friendship, you shall have the first ranke if you will. Alas Madam (said I) a Page 182 Lover can never be contented with the first quality of a friend; and I had rather be in the lowest rank of your Lovers, than in the highest of your friends. Howsoever, Mercontes (said she) this is all I can do; Consider seriously upon it, for if you should refuse the first ranke of my friends, perhaps I shall become your Enemy: As I was ready to answer, one came in, and said her Mother did aske for her: so that I left her, not accepting the quality of her first friend, and she not permitting me to be her Lover.

Yet since I had discovered my passion, my heart was something more at ease: and my greatest hope was, in knowing certainly that Dorinice did hold me in the notion of friendship, so as imagining it not impossible but her affection might change its nature, and believing it a more easie step from friendship to love, then from indifferency unto that passion, my hopes did keep life in them: so as I passed over some dayes without any great inquietude, thinking it but fit I should give Dorinice some time of consideration before I could expect any recompence: Yet there was not a day in which this multitude of her friends did not perplex me, and in which I did not feare that this which some of them called friendship, may be called by the name of Love: and indeed I understood at last, that there were at least two Lovers in this disguise of friendship: so that with jealousy and love together, I had many a vexatious hour. Yet after I had well observed these concealed Rivals, I was not so jealous of them, as of some other of her friends: Not but that one of them was very handsome, and likely to prove a very dangerous Rival, for his person was very pleasing, and he had a delicate wit: and since his first affection was unto a person of great merit and wit, this did infuse such a politenesse into his conversation, as made him so accomplished as he was; for it is most certain that nothing is more pernicious unto young men, then first to engage them selves in Love with foolish persons: and indeed, this second Rival made this apparant which I speak, for he was better born than the other, also he had wit and spirit enough: and yet it was his misfortune to fall at first into intimacy and familiarity with many women of mean merit, who were unfashionable, and knew not the world, so as he blasted his wit by their society, and did insensibly accustom himselfe, to be such a one as his company were, so as I had no cause to fear him: And for the other, though he had wit, merit, and manners enough, yet I did not feare him neither; because Dorinice suspecting him in Love with her, did treat him worse than the rest of her friends. I saw also very clearly, that these two Rivals had not so great a part as my selfe in the heart of this faire one; for she was pleased to tell me what they said unto her: But as for her friends, she would not impart the least syllable of what they said, though I vowed she was most absolute Mistress of my hear, and told her, that though generosity required that I should never reveale the secrets of my friends: Yet she had such a power over me, that I could not keep my own: But this aggravation of my Love caused a great quarrell the next day; for he pleased to know Sir, that both of us meeting the day following in a place where one of the Ladies who formerly I loved was with much other company, Dorinice very craftily began to talk of the power which a Mistress hath over the heart of her Lover: and hearing that some reports of my passion were divulged in our Court, she would needs be so pleasant as to twit me with it. And to that end she told me very openly, that as I was talking the day before with her, I said, that as soon as ever I became a Lover, I would sacrifice all my own, and my friends secrets unto my Mistress, and that I had already told her all the passages of my first Love: So as being driven to the necessity either of contradicting what she whom I then loved had said, or else displeasing her whom I loved not, I made choice of the latter, and would rather anger my old Mistress then my new one; yet I turned the matter as well as I could: Indeed I said (replied I unto Dorinice) that when one is in love, one hath nothing which is their own: but I did not say I would relate the secrets of friends and former loves unto my Mistress, what I said was this, that if she would needs know them, and command me peremptorily to tell them, I should have much ado to disobey her. Yet (replied one of Dorinices friends who always told her every thing) I do not think that ought to be; for if I did, I would never tell any thing unto my friends: For my part (said the Lady whom I loved) I think he is a perfidious Lover, who Page 183 reveals the secrets of his Friend unto his Mistress, and that she is an unworthy Mistress who shall desire it.

For my particular (replied a friend of Dorinices whose name was Nirtile, unto whom she made signe to contradict that Lady whom I loved) I do not understand your meaning, but I am sure that the greater sweetness of love is the absolute empire of a Lovers heart: and if I had one who should conceale any thing from me which I desired to know, I would never look upon him again; for he did not love me, if he did not blindly obey me, right or wrong: and I would not only have a Lover tell the secrets of his friends, but I would also have him commit an unjust act if I should command him: he may as well do the last (replied a friend of Dorinices, whose name was Oxaris) as reveale the secrets of his friends, which of all things in the world ought most inviolably to be kept: and for my part, who does not think that Justice and generosity are incompatible with love, I cannot think it allowable to be perfidious, but am so much against it, that had I a Mistress who would exact this testimony of my love, I should no longer esteem her, and consequently be no longer her Lover, and so should never tell her my friends secrets.

Did you know what Love were (replied I) you would not have said so: For though a Mistress should command unjust things, yet for all that one cannot leave loving her for it: for if love were a thing voluntary, it would of necessity follow that all the world would love none but admirable persons, such as there is not perhaps three in a whole Kingdome, and in a whole age: and there would be such a crowd about them, that there would be no approaching: Yet experience shewes us every day, that there are men of great wits, parts, and spirits, who fall in love with persons that have faults, and faults which they know of, and which yet will not cure their passions. I know very well (replied Oxaris sharply) that one may find his Mistress a little pale, or a little swarthy complexioned, and yet not leave loving her: and one may know that there is some inequality in her humour, and some levity in her spirit, and yet not change, yet I cannot understand how one should continue loving a woman without honesty and vertue. And I dare boldly affirm that the person who reveals the secrets of his friends, is as great an offender against the rules of vertue and honesty, as any Traytor is; and there is nothing in the world more odious then to betray those who trust them. Were I to judg only of the thing it selfe (replied Nirtile) I should condemn it: But however I must needs affirm, that if a man be in love, and will not tell his Mistress all he knows: she desire it, he does but love by halves; for he is not so much obliged in point of honour, to conceale the secrets of his friends, as he is in point of love to tell his Mistress what she desires to know: For he is not to examine whether her desires be just or no, but to give her a testimony of his love, he is to obey her blindly; since there is no greater than that of obedience, and without obedience there is no love nor delight in loving.

For my part (replied my former Mistress) I know not how to comprehend this: and for my part (replied Oxaris) I see no reason in it: For I beseech you (said he unto Dorinice, though he did not dispute the matter with her) may there not be many just causes of ceasing to love: Doubtlesse there may (replied she): if so (replied he) why is it more just, that jealousy should make love dye, then when you discover your Mistress is not truly vertuous; as she is not, if shee would have you perfidious; is there not much more reason to break off with her for that, then because she did not cast an eye a little favourably upon a Rival? should I look upon you as a Philosopher: you have reason for what you say (answered Nirtile) but when I look upon you as a Lover, I cannot think you ought to deny your Mistress any thing. Truth is, if you deny her any thing that is unjust, you are to be looked upon as a wise man, whose passions are all in his own command. But for all that, the Lady who required the injustice from you, will charge you with being a bad Lover: For though she be in the wrong, to desire any thing that is unreasonable, however you have no reason to deny her, and you can expect nothing, unlesse whilst your friends do say you are discreet, your Mistress will say you know not how to love. The best of it is (replied I) not to grieve the Page 184 Lady too much with whom I had former correspondency) There are but few Ladies who are so unjust, or who will trouble themselves with knowing a thousand trifles which they have nothing to do withall.

For my part (replied Dorinice very maliciously) were I in the humour of halving a Lover, my chief delight would be in making him relate all passages of his past love. As for the secrets of his friends, I would not desire to know them: but as for trifles of gallantry which are such fond follies when they are past, and seem always so to them who have no interest in them, I should take the greatest pleasure in the world in hearing them exactly related unto me: and if any reason induce me to admit of a Lover, I think it will be in hopes of this delight, in which I fancy such great diversion: And if I do make choice of a Lover, it shall be of such a one who hath loved many others; for though they say first passions are most violent, yet I would not be his first Mistress, lest I should loose the pleasures which I mentioned before. If Madam, the knowledge of many secrets do so much delight one (replied I) then if you should admit of a Lover who were of Nirtles humour, he would have a fine time of it, if you should reveale all the secrets of your friends unto him: You I say, who has such a multitude of them, that they can hardly be numbred. I cannot tell whether you jeer me in this or no (replied she and smiled) but I conceive the greatest commendations that can be given me is, that I have so much wit as to get and keep so many friends: But Madam (said I unto her to turn the discourse) do you think it any honour in admitting so many of them? and do you believe that under colour of this gallant kind of friendship you ought to have a thousand at a time? if so, I must needs confesse, that I think it a great convenience for a Lover to have many Mistresses, as for a Lady to have many Gallants. I am so fully perswaded (replied Dorinice) that one may have as many friends as they will, that I look upon my friendship as a thing infinite: and when I have purchased any new friend, and payd him my friendship for it, after the rate that I think he esteems me, yet I find my selfe as rich within a quarter of an hour after, as if I had given him nothing for it: Then I perceive (said I unto her) that it is not according to merit that you grant your affection. No (replied she) merit is the measure of my esteem, and friendship the measure of my friendship, and thus I assure you I use to distribute my selfe very equally.

For my particular (replied I) I cannot conceive that one can much love such a number of men, nor know how any man can content himself with the hundred part of a heart; for if I had not a whole one, I should never think my selfe happy. Then you shall never have one (replied Dorinice and smiled) for I will never give all mine unto one man. After which, she rising up, and I going with her, I complained against her for her malice, and afterwards in a low voyce used all my Rhetorick to perswade her unto a permission of my passion: But all to no purpose, and all my arguments and perswasions could obtaine no more from her, then the first of her friends: so as seeing no other remedy, I would try, if I could content my selfe with that rank she gave me in her heart: And indeed, I must needs say, that Dorinice was as good as her promise unto me, and I had no cause to think that she was more favourable unto any friend than unto me: For she spake to me with much confidence, she was always very glad to see me, she discoursed with delight, and she would sincerely give mee her opinion in any thing we talked of. Moreover, she did interest her selfe in my fortune; if I were sicke, she would send constantly to see how I did: if by chance I were two dayes from her, she would have me tell her what I had been doing: She took my part always ever against her dearest friends: she would highly commend me: she would have all her acquaintance esteem me, and was every way very obliging. So as it may be said, that I enjoyed all the sweets and pleasures of a most solid, tender, and gallant friendship. Yet all this while I was nothing contented, and the most favourable looks of Dorinice made me more angry then pleased; for though I never saw her eyes incensed, yet I could never see them as I desired: The truth is, she looked upon me, as people use to look upon all indifferent objects which are in their sight; her eyes were all tranquillity, and I could never see in them the least languishing glance which is the true character of Love.

Page 185 I never saw them troubled, transported, or passionate; they had no language of Love in them, nor did they understand me when mine spoke in that dialect: So as I could never think my self happy.

Moreover, though she was alwaies gladder when I talked with her, than any other of her friends, yet I could never perceive that my conversation made any deepe impression; for if any who had any private business came unto her, she would leave me to talk with him, and leave me without any Regret: also be at severall diversions wherein I had no share without any inquietudes, and all the priviledge I had by being her first friend was, that she would sometimes be a little freer with me than with others, and knowing that I did love her though I did not often tell her so, she used all waies imaginable to make me beleive, that her Amity would never be any other than Amity, and indeed she did so well perswade me of it, that I thought my self the most miserable man alive. So as not being able to contain my self any longer, I fell into a continuall course of complaints and complained so much that I was troublesome unto her: And the very truth is, my complaints were excusable, for there is nothing upon Earth more intollerable then to be extreemly in Love with one who returns only friendship: And there is no comparison to be made between that misery, and to love without being loved again: For in this case one is perpetually neer a happiness, and never is like to enjoy it, and all services are to no end further than what one already knows, which can never give any content for it is a most undoubted truth, that the most fervent friendship in the world, is not comparable to the lowest degree of Love: Yet Dorinice would needs one day perswade me, that my complaints were unjust, for (said she) were my affection to you of another nature than it is, I should do less for you then I do: I should think Madam, (said I unto her) that in doing less, you did more, and I am so confident of what I say, that I should think my self more happy if I could see you sometimes turn away your fair eyes for fear of meeting mine, than to see them so full of tranquillity as they are; and to shew you how little my Love is satisfied with your friendship I do declare unto you Madam, that your indifferency would be much less intollerable. This is so very fantastical (replied she) that I almost think you are out of your wits; were you in love Madam but one quarter of an hour, (replied I) you would quickly finde that the most miserable condition of a Lover, is to be perswaded that he must never be loved; so that Madam, beginning to think that it is an easier step from indifferency unto Love, than that a long continued friendship should become that passion, you need not wonder I should think my self the most miserable of men, in that I see all my Love, all my Cares, and all my Services can never alter the nature of your affection to me. And yet Madam, me thinks it is so easie a matter for you to make me happy, that I know no reason why you do not: For I am contented you should love me less than you do, so you will but love me in another manner, and otherwise it is impossible I should ever be satisfied, for Love is never satisfied but with Love again, and all your tender, gallant, and solid friendship is not comparable to the lowest degree of that passion, and therefore I beseech you judge, whether it be likely to satisfie the most violent passion that ever was: For all this (replied Dorinice) I must tell you again, that if I should love in that manner as you mean, you would be less happy then you are; for now I shew you all the tenderness of my heart, I communicate my very soul unto you, and I have a thousand obliging cares for you: whereas if I should love you as you desire I should, I should then conceal all the tenderness of my thoughts from you, I should make choice of the most indifferent words to express my affection to you, and I should shun the place where you are, and therefore I pray judge whether you would not be more miserable in my Love than in my friendship: And to tell you truly, it is my friendship unto which you are beholding, for this my indulgency in suffering you to speak thus unto me of your passion, for did I not perceive the constitution of my heart such, as it is impossible I should ever love you in any other manner, I should never suffer you.

Oh Madam, (said I) this is the extremity of cruelty; how ignorant are you in the sweets of Love and of being loving, a hundred and a hundred thousand friends cannot afford one single gust of it. I beseech you consider, that you have not an Page 186 absolute power over any one of your friends; there is not one of them but are able to deny you something: Whereas your power over me is absolute without any exception, you are mistress of my destiny, you can frame all my good fortune, and all my bad, and you have such an absolute Empire in my heart, that you must reign in it as long as you live. But Madam, to reign with delight, you must take some care for the preservation of your authority: Cast off therefore Madam, this multitude of friends, amongst all which, perhaps there is not one who truly merits the name of friend, or are really worthy of your friendship: But if you will not rid your self of this croud which are troublesome both to you and me, yet I beseech you make some difference in your Love betwixt me and them, for I do affect singularity so much in matter of affection, that I cannot endure to be loved in the same degree with others. Put some difference, I beseech you Madam, betwixt me and your friends, and know that if you do not, I must infallibly either loose my life, or my reason and wits, for I am most certain I can never loose that affection which I have unto you.

Me thinks Mereontes (said she unto me) that in telling you I esteem you as the cheif of my friends, and so distinguish you, that this should content you: Alas Madam (replied I) though you should tell me that I am your only friend, and though I am a Lover of singularity, yet should I not be contented; for your affection is still friendship, and before I can be satisfied, your friendship must either become Love or my Love friendship, and therefore since it is an easier matter to add some degree of heat unto your affection, than it is to quench the flames of mine, I beseech you and conjure you to strive a little to love me in another manner then you do.

But Mereontes, (said she unto me) do you not consider that if I should love you as you desire, you shall receive no favours from me? and that I cannot be so indulgent to you as now I am, for I see you, and I talk as long as you please: Yes Madam (replied he sharply) you do see me, and you do talk with me; but you do them not with the same joy which you would, if you loved me as I desire: There wants that mutuall exchange of pleasures which does nourish and augment Love, and which is the cheif felicity of Lovers And therefore Madam only out of curiosity, I beseech you try the difference between Love and Friendship, and do not deprive your self of lifes greatest delight, by making me the most miserable of men.

Yet all these intimations in the sweets of Love unto Dorinice were to no purpose, for Sir, she was unalterable, and I could not obtain the least hope of ever changing her mind: So I was in a most miserable condition, nor could I make any appeal to the Judges and Laws of Love, because they were established only for such as do or did love one another, and I bring the only party that ever loved, I could not have any remedy for them. Yet was I not able to inclose all my sorrows in my heart, but complained in such a sad manner unto Doronices friend whose name was Nyrtile, that I did mollifie her heart, and moved her to speak in my behalf unto her friend.

And as they were walking one day in a Garden, she severed her from the rest of her company, and told her she did not well to mixe me among the number of her other friends, and that she had no reason to entertain such a croud of them as she did. For truly, (said Nyrtile to her) my humour is such that I had rather make choice of some man of accomplished parts, than to love a hundred or two. Alas Nirtile, (said she than unto her) can you think I do love all those who tearm themselves my friends? I cannot tell (answered Nirtile) but you seem as if you did, and as if you thought them all the most faithfull, and sincere friends in the world.

The truth is (answered Dorinice) I am just unto all my friends, for I know how to distinguish betwixt those who visit me out of vanity, or for interest, or out of custome, or out of inclination: And I have unto those who love me, such a kind of civility as befits such as are to be esteemed; for if I had not, I should deprive my self of a thousand delights, which the conversation of such men afforded it but for all that, I only love those who love me very well, and I am able to make it my boast, that I am the justest person in the world unto all those who use to see Page 187 me. You must except Mereontes Madam, (replied Nyrtile) for certainly he has no reason to be pleased with you.

Perhaps he hath more reason than you imagin, (replied she) for I assure you, I have been striving as much as I could these two months together, either to love him as he would be, or else to hate him: The one half of this had been enough to have told me (replied Nirtile) doubtless it had (replied she) but I could not unless I had lied; for the truth is, Mereontes doth every day move me unto both those thoughts, though they be very opposite to each other: When I look upon his restless inquietude, and consider his Merit, his Affection, and my own Friendship to him, I wish I were able to make him happy by loving him as he desires: But on the other side, when he smothers me with his complaints, upbraids me with my many friends, and permittance of many Lovers, this unjust persecution makes me desire to hate him, and yet I find an equall impossibility in both; and therefore I must remain as I am, and if he be not contented, I cannot help it.

However Madam (said Nirtile to her) though you cannot love him, yet I beseech you be less friendly unto others, and lessen the number of such friends as do so neerly resemble Lovers, that truly I wonder Merontes doth not look upon them as Rivals. Nay, as for that Nirtile, (replied Dorinice) indeed I cannot do it, and to tell you truly, that was as much as I could do, did I love Mereontes? for these kind of triviall amities of gallantry do render conversation so agreeable, and so sweetly amuse the mind, without disquieting the heart, as I cannot part with one of them. Truly Madam (replied Nirtile) you are very unreasonable, I know not (said Dorinice) whether I be unreasonable; but I cannot think it any imprudence; for as I do behave my self, I do enjoy a thousand pleasures without hazarding my reputation, and I do enjoy them without any inquietudes of melancholly, and therefore I pray tell Mercontes, (if he did interest you to speak unto me) that his best course is to rest in quiet, and to let me rest so also. For it were a most cruel thing that one who enjoys all the delights of innocent gallantry, should expose her self unto all the persecutions of Love, when she is not capable of that passion.

After this Nirtile had no more to say, but as one that was very sincere, she told me the next morning all the discourse, with intention to persuade me, either to comply with the humour of Dorinice, or to quench my flames of Love, but to tell you truly, I could do neither.

In the mean time, the season of the year came on, in which we were wont to celebrate a great feast of thanks, unto the gods for separating us from the ancient Sauro-mates, this was the time when Dorinices croud of friends did more perplex me than usually, for she was continually taken up with some piece of courtship or other, so as I may say, I saw her and saw her not; and to my grief I observed every day an addition of new friends which others brought unto her: And as soon as the admirable Sapho came into our Court, Phaon, and the brother of Phylire were also admitted into the number of her friends. I wished that I could make my self as many friends as she did, to try if any such delight could be found in a multitude, but it was impossible for me, yet I saw Sapho and Agelaste very often, and complained of my misery unto them; for my passion was grown so publick, that every one knew of it. And truly I must needs confess, I found much comfort from them; for both of them did so penetrate into the depth of my thoughts, that I perceived they knew them as well as my self. And since they did not think it expedient to flatter me, they ingeniously told me, that they did not think so ancient a friendship as that of Dorinices unto me, could ever become love, so Sir, knowing Sapho to be one, who knew every one that came into her company, the soonest and most perfectly of any one in the world; I grounded as much upon what she said as if she had been one who could infallibly tell the future fate of things: And though I found much comfort in complaining unto her against the unalterable coldness of Dorinices heart, yet she made me much more miserable, by telling me her thoughts. But in the confidence that I had in the depth of her wisdom, I desired her she would be pleased to take so much pains as to sound the depth of Dorinices mind, and to tell me then her opinion; so as I obliged her to promise me her best endeavour, and to report unto me the truth of her imaginations: And after she had held much discourse Page 188 with Dorinice severall times: After a serious consideration of her behaviour, and after extraordinary pains to know her throughly, and had spoken of me unto her with much affection; she told me that there was no hopes that Dorinice would ever change her mind: and that if I could not be contented with being the first of her friends, she would advise me to be no longer her Lover: Alas Madam (said I unto her) it is not the quality of Dorinices friend can ever satisfie me: and yet were I the only one who had that title, perhaps I should preserve all my Love unto her, provided she bestowed all her friendship upon me: But Madam, she adds every day unto the number of her friends, and therefore since Dorinice cannot love me, nor let me have her entire friendship, I must endeavour to quench my flames: For it is not possible I should long continue loving one whose soule is so rocky, that she had rather make me miserable, than part from the least of her friends: And since I am not able to leave loving her as long as I see her, I must quit my Country. Sapho honouring me with her friendship, did at the first oppose my design: But at last, she saw I was so miserable, that she confessed banishment would be more sweet unto me, than Dorinices presence. Yet since she would not omit any thing which might conduce unto my tranquility, she brought it so to passe by the negotiation and discretion of Phaon, that though the Judges appointed for the determination of all differences in Love, could not by their Law meddle with any things but such as passed between persons who had once contracted affection, yet they would take consance of this difference between Dorinice and me. At the first it did much incense her: but since Sapho procured the Queen to countenance the matter by her Authority, she was forced to put in her answer, and I also preferred my Complaint before the Judges.

Then they began to put severall questions of much curiosity, for they asked whether a Lover could content himselfe with the friendship of one, who did not love any other? They asked also whether a Lover had any reason to be jealous of the friends unto his Mistress? and whether these two things were a cause of legall complaint, and a just reason to change affection? Time will not allow me Sir, to particularize the whole matter unto you who have no interest in it: But give me leave to tel you in short, that after serious consideration of these two questions, the judges said, that as to the first it was out of all doubt, that Friendship could never come in comparison with Love, nor give it satisfaction: And they declared that a Lover might accuse his Mistress of ingratitude, and complain as of a high piece of injustice, if she doe not answer his affection with an affection of the same nature. For besides (say they) that Love is a passion which in all things requires equality of hearts. They said further, that a Lover can never be in security as long as his Mistress is only his friend; since he is in danger every moment to see her fall in love with another: so as they declared that I had good reason not to be satisfied with the friendship of Dorinice.

Afterwards they said, that as to the second thing in question, That jealousy was of so large an extent, that possibly it might be so, as one might be jealous without any Rivals, since one might be jealous of any thing, which too much took up the heart of the person loved; and (said he who reported the opinion of the assembly) since one is not so jealous of those thoughts which others have of the Lady whom one loves, as they are of those thoughts which she hath of others, it follows, that one may be jealous of any thing which engageth her heart any manner of way: If she affect any solitude too much, a Lover may without extravagancy be a little jealous: Judg therefore I beseech you then, since Dorinice having a hundred Friends who may become her Lovers, or who at least take up a great part of her heart, and who fill up her time so, that Mereontes can hardly ever speak unto her: whether I say, such a Lover hath not reason to entertain some thoughts which may be termed jealousy, and whether he have not reason to complain of her, since she is so eternally taken up with her friends, and such friends as so nearly resemble Lovers, that one may easily mistake the one for the other.

As soon as this was said, a friend of Dorinices who pretended unto the first Rank, stood up, and said that it was great injustice to think friends could be jealous: That this was the way to violate all the privileges of friendship, which Page 189 of all things upon earth ought to be most inviolable: And that it would put a great disorder and confusion amongst all men, if love and friendship should be declared incompatible; for as friendship cannot be without love, so love and friendship may consist together.

Then she instanced many examples out of antiquity, to make it appear that one may be a zealous Lover and a zealous Friend both at one time: And amongst the rest that of Achilles, who though extremely in love with Briseis, yet loved Patrocles with abundance of tenderness: And after this, he desired it might be declared, that Dorinice might admit of as many friends as she pleased, without being subject unto any complaints against her: But Sir, after this friend of Dorinices had said all he could, and after I had answered all his objections against me, the Judges ordained, that Dorinice should make her choice, either to answer my affection with the like: Or if she could not, and would yet preserve me, to exclude all the rest of her friends, to the end I might solely remain in her heart: declaring, that if she would do neither of these two, I might lawfully quit her without inconstancy, or being accused of ingratitude. So Sir, Dorinice being unable either to love me, or renounce that multitude of friends which diverted her, she publicly declared that she was so far from doing either of these two things, as she was fully resolved upon two other things quite contrary: For (said she) I am resolved never to love as long as I live, neither will I faile to admit of more new friends. You may easily imagine Sir, how this cruel Declaration of Dorinices went to my heart: But that which finished my despair was, that she sent unto me she would never see me any more, and yet the very same day she sent this rigorous message, she admitted of two fresh friends: so as resolving upon absence, I employed the illustrious Sapho to obtain a licence from the Queen, to go out of her Dominions: And so I did, without bidding adieu unto any but Sapho, Agelaste, and Phaon.

As soon as I had passed those Desarts which environ our Country, I came into the Territories of the ancient Sauromates, where I found Troops ready to depart, which Aripithes had levied for Thomyris: So as I conceiving War the best remedy against Love, I followed them without any other design but to forget Dorinice. But though I am not able to do it, yet I am so fully resolved never to see her again, that I will voluntarily banish my selfe for ever out of the most pleasant Countrey in the world. But Sir, if you will be pleased to give me leave to devote my selfe inseparably unto your service, I shall hope for more tranquility and satisfaction then ever I had: And my joyes in finding such an illustrious Protector will be above my sorrows for the losse of an unjust Mistressse.

Mereontes having ended his Relation and his Complement, Cyrus returned a very obliging answer unto this illustrious Sauromate. After which, entring into deep Cogitations of his past misfortunes and present miseries, he spake little all the rest of the day. But night being come, and all things ready, Cyrus entred into this close Coach which Meliantes; and Mereontes being their Convoy, they got out by the favour of the night, none observing that Cyrus was in the Coach: And as they got well out of the Camp, so they arrived at the Tents Royall; and as good luck for Cyrus was, the Tent of Meliantes being one of the very first, Cyrus was presently in a place where none could see him unless Meliantes would, and where it was unlikely any would seek for him; for his death was so generally believed on all sides, that it was divulged over all places in the world. The Grecians which were in the Army writ into Greece, the Persians sent unto Persepolis; the Medes made it known in Media; Intaphernes writ into Pontus and Bythinia; The Assyrians sent into Babylon: Thrasimedes writ into Lycia: Ligdamis unto Ephesus, Myrsiles unto Sardis, and so all the rest into their severall Countreys: And the noise of his death was so universally divulged in all remote places, and so generally believed, that many excellent Histories were deceived by the mistake, and Historians have left this supposed death of Cyrus in their Histories, as true, though the truth is, it was the unfortunate Spitridates who lost his life, and passed for this illustrious Conqueror.

In the mean time, Feraulas in this generall belief of Cyrus his death, endeavoured all manner of ways to find out his Corps: And having many friends since the time that Cyrus was there under the name of Artamenes, hee employed all their Page 190 helps in the discovery: But in his Quest of one thing, he discovered another, which made him extremely joyed; for he understood by accident, that the Gelon Captain who presented the head of Spitridates unto Thomyris, as the head of Cyrus, did endeavour to sell those rich Arms of gold which that unfortunate Prince did wear the last day of his life, and which Cyrus gave unto him after his Combate with Aripithes: So as Feraulas knowing that Cyrus wore a very common suit of Arms that day, he concluded, that of necessity it must be the head of Spitridates which Thomyris plunged in blood, and not of Cyrus: so as much hope and joy began to revive in his soule, and so as the death of Spitridates which before made him full of sorrow, now filled him full of joy.

On the other side, as soon as Cyrus was got safe into the Tent of Meliantes, where Mereontes was close concealed with him, Meliantes began to contrive wayes for his deliverance: and yet he would not be seen in two dayes, lest his Counterfeit sickness should be suspected: And during these two dayes, Mereontes and he did bethink themselves whether there was any possibility of releasing Mandana, as well as Cyrus: For since there was many Sauromates in the Army of Thomyris, who since the death of their Prince, had no affection unto that Princess, they thought it no hard businesse to move them unto a mutiny. And since it was Mereontes who had commanded them under Aripithes, it was most fit for him to negotiate with the rest of the Captains over those Forces. So as Meliantes and he communicating their thoughts unto Cyrus, he did so concur with them, that he desired them to endeavour the execution of this design, before they thought any more of getting him out of the Tents Royall. And truly said he unto them, if you can bring the businesse unto that passe, as that there must be any fighting for Mandana, I will be there in person, and not be a debtor unto your valour only for her Liberty.

That which did further the design of Mereontes was, that there were many Sauromattan Captains in the Tents Royall, who stayed there to aske the leave of Thomyris for their departure. So that to loose no time, after Meliantes had kept in two dayes to disguise his sickness, he went out; and sounding the minds of the Sauromattan Captains, who were all intimate friends unto Mereontes, he found their pulses to beate according to his wishes: So as obliging them very handsomely to come one Evening unto his Tent, he let them see Mereontes, unto whom they did as much vow their obedience, as unto their Prince, expressing so much desire to revenge his death, as they wished Cyrus were living, that they might fight under his Banners: Yet Mereontes did not think it expedient to tell them that their wishes were accomplished, until their design was ripe: but he desired them to dispose the minds of their Souldiers, so as they might obey them upon any occasion whatsoever, assuring them, that if they did make themselves Masters of their Troops, he would very shortly give them a brave occasion to signalize their Valours, to revenge the death of Aripithes, to get much glory, and to enrich themselves if they would. After which, some of them returned to the Camp, to do as Mereontes desired them, and the rest stayed still to confer about the correspondency betwixt Mereontes and them.

After this, Cyrus being acquainted with the promises of these Captains, he resolved that when they had made sure of their Souldiers, to give secret intelligence of this unto Cressus and Mazares, who commanded his Army, to the end that when the Sauromates did sever themselves from the Army of Thomyris, to fall upon the Tents Royal, they might at the same time fall upon the Camp of Ariantes: And that those great Auxiliaries which Ciaxares sent him under the name of Aglatidas his Kins-man, might attempt to joyn with them, and enforce those Troops which Andramites had set to guard the passages: So as Thomyris and Ariantes having so many things to do at once, they might be the more dismayed, and easier overcome.

But since he would not attempt any thing rashly, until he heard the Sauromattan Captains were assured of their Souldiers, Cyrus was in a strange perplexity, for he durst not make it known unto Mandana that he was alive, lest the way of his conveying that news unto her should miscarry, and so he should both ruine himself, and deprive her of his assistance. Doubtlesse he might have obliged Meliantes Page 191 to have made it known unto Arpasia, and by her, have conveyed it unto Mandana: But as oft as he considered, if he should fall into the hands of Thomyris, both he and she were for ever ruined, he chose rather to let her be ignorant of his being living, then to hazard their being for ever miserable. Yet sometimes he was so extremely desirous she should know he was living, that he was ready to run through all dangers, and would hazard all for one single sight of Mandana. That which most augmented his desire of it was, because he saw no great difficulty in it; for he understood by Meliantes, that the Tent wherein she was, was not now so strictly guarded: and that Thomyris and Ariantes were so fully perswaded of his death, that they feared not the speaking of any unto her, and yet the Guards were so strict, as to hinder her from making an escape: Ariantes also was very circumspect to hinder Thomyris from executing any revenge upon that Princess: but it was no difficulty to obtain so much liberty as to speak with her, since the death of Cyrus was believed: So as this great Prince who had never seen Mandana, since Ariantes under the name of Anaxaris carried her away, had now a most unmeasurable desire of seeing her, so as he could not choose but express as much unto Meliantes and Mereontes: but they made it so full of danger unto him, that they dissuaded him: For Sir (said Meliantes unto him) should you be known, it would not be your life that would be in the danger, for the affection which Thomyris has unto you, would keep her from being so cruell unto Cyrus living, as she was unto Cyrus dead: But what cruelties will she not inflict upon the Princesse Mandana? therefore I beseech you command mee no such service, as you may repent of it as long as you live, and which may render you the miserablest of men.

So Cyrus being convinced both of his reasons and his prayers, he resolved to give over all thoughts of seeing Mandana, and think of nothing but how to conceale himself in expectation of this great attempt which Meliantes and Mereontes was plotting; for as Mereontes had great credit amongst the Sauromates, so Meliantes endeavoured to gain some of Mandana's Guard, with whom he was in very good esteem, yet he could not do any thing against Hydaspes: and if he did get any new credit in the heart of Arpasia, it was without diminishing of the reputation of his Rivall. However, flattering himself, and knowing very well that Arpasia esteemed him very much; he believed that if he could once deliver Mandana and Cyrus, Hydaspes then durst not dispute with him for the possession of Arpasia. But sometimes the violence of his Love would put his Vertue unto a most difficult tryall; for when he thought, that if he should put Cyrus into the hands of Thomyris, he should easily oblige her to put Arpasia into his, his heart did a little stagger: Yet for all that, Meliantes was both just and generous, and would not buy the possession of Arpasia at so unworthy a rate as the ruine of the greatest Prince, and most victorious Princess in the world. So as transacting upon noble Principles, and choosing rather to be unfortunate, then to be happy by any base ways, or by the miseries of illustrious persons, he seconded the valiant Mereontes, who had negotiated the business so happily, that all the Captains of his correspondency assured him their Souldiers were at their command, and they at his, demanding yet some days to get the Gelous unto their side, who exceedingly murmured that it should be a Captain of their Nation, who in hope of recompence should present the supposed head of Cyrus unto Thomyris; though they said, that without them he had never conquered that Prince.

In the interim, Cyrus heard by Meliantes, that the Armies were still in their Trenches: That the Reliefe which Cyaxares sent, drew neer: that Arsamones was killed by a Rebellion of the people: that the Princess his Daughter was extremely troubled, and that both she and Araminta grieved that they could not hear what was become of Spitridates: But the most observable of all was, Meliantes understood by Arpasia, that these two dayes Mandana was nothing so sad as she was: her tears did stop, her sighes were not so frequent, and she could talk of any thing. Cyrus asking every day how Mandana did; and Meliantes using to shew him the greatnesse of her sorrows, because he saw it was some sweetnesse unto him to know the fidelity of her he loved, he was much put to it, how to answer him that day: yet since he would not disquiet him, he told him that he knew Page 192 not how she did that day, but being something slow in the return of his answer and the spirit of a Lover being more penetrating than any others: Cyrus did know that Meliantes had not answered him sincerely; so that imagining Mandana to be very sick with grief, his spirits were so stirred, and he expressed himself so sadly unto Meliantes, as he acquainted him ingeniously with what Arpasia had said, adding to qualifie the matter, that doubtless, Mandana did moderate her grief at the hearing of the relief which the King her Father had sent: And therefore hoping to see his Death shortly revenged, and her self delivered, the Excess of her sorrows did something diminish.

Alas Meliantes (cried Cyrus out) if Mandana can so soon forget my death, Mandana will never think upon revenging it; No, no, Mandana is unfaithfull: Ariantes triumphes over my misfortune, and I am the most miserable of men. Oh I beseech you Sir, (replied Meliantes) do not thus afflict your-self at what I tell you, until you know whether you have any cause, for you have so many real causes to grieve at, that me thinks you should not build upon any appearances which are often fallacious, No, no Meliantes, (replied Cyrus) the consolation of Mandana can have no cause which can be advantageous unto me, and I am sure that if she had not changed her affection to me, she could not beleive me dead, or receive her Liberty without Tears: And therefore I must sadly conclude, that since she can so soon clear up her sorrows, I must despair; but yet Meliantes, I desire to dy at her feet after I have killed Ariantes. Sir, (replied he) when our design is ripe then perhaps in delivering Mandana, you may kill your Rivall, but in the mean time, I beseech you be not too rash. Is it possible unjust Princess, (cried out Cyrus, and addressed his speech unto Mandana, as if she had heard him) that you can so soon forget the Death of a Prince, who valued his own life not at a straw, when he thought you dead at Synope? and who had most infallibly killed himself, had he been certain that you were not living? you I say, who has made me a promise of immortall affection, and whose soul alwaies seemed unto me, so high and generous. Oh most ungratefull Princess, have you forgotten all I have done for you? can you retain in your imagination that bloody head which you thought to be mine, and be able to talk of things so indifferent? Oh Mandana, Can you think me dead and not grieve? if it be so, then am I the basest of all men living, if I continue still my Love unto you.

As Cyrus was in this extremity of grief, and as Meliantes was endeavouring to comfort him, they heard a great noise; and a little after they understood, that fire accidentally hapning in Mandana's Tents, they carried her, and all the rest of the Ladies Prisoners unto other Tents, and in their passage to them, they must of necessity go by the Tent where Cyrus was. This sadly afflicted Prince, would needs see Mandana with his own eyes, though Meliantes did what he could to hinder him: But Meliantes and Mereontes both got neer him, purposely to hinder him from shewing himself as Mandana passed by, and indeed they had good reason for their foresight; For when Mandana passed by, when he saw her in a Coach guarded by Ariantes, and when he observed in the Countenance of that Princess, a grave sadness without any extream sorrow, his resentments were beyond all imagination.

But to compleat up the totall sum of his sorrows, Mandanas Coach was forced to stay, because one of the horses in that Coach wherein Araminta was, being lame upon a sudden, and that Coach going before Mandanas, it was also forced to stay: And as chance would have it, staying just before the Tent where Cyrus was, that Prince had better leasure to observe the motions of Mandanas face; he could not discover either any joyes or myrth in her, nor could he see any grief or excessive sorrow, but he saw one thing which made him almost mad and needs would he go and upbraid Mandana with a thousand reproaches: And if he had had any Arms, it is to be believed he would have set upon his Rivall for all his great number of armed guards. The cause of his excessive rage was, because Mandana having Dorastise and Martesia only in the Coach with her, and turning her head towards a multitude of people on her right hand which looked upon her as she passed by; she whispered Martesia in the ear, & shewed unto her some body whom Martesia also looked upon, and as Mandana shewed her, a little collour came into her Checks, Page 193 which presently dissipating part of her sadness, did bring into her eyes such an inclination unto joy as appears in the aspects of such as smile, yet this disposition lasted but an instant: For presently after, Mandana lifting up her eyes unto Heaven, as if she prayed for something, returned unto her former aspect of serious sadness; but though this little smile did last but an instant, yet it raised a great and long sorrow in the soul of Cyrus.

But as good fortune for him was, he was so surprized at this sight, as his wonder did for a time deprive him of his speech, otherwise certainly his complaints had been so loud, that Mandana might have heard them from the Tent where he was, and as good luck was, Meliantes and Mereontes were with him, to hinder him from shewing himself as he intended.

But the Horse in Aramintas Coach being recovered, both it and Mandanas belgan to put on, and Cyrus loosing the sight of this Princess, he remained in a most miserable condition. Is it possible (said he, after he had recovered himself) that Mandana can smile under the power of my Rivall? and in a beliefe that I am in my Grave? Since I have seen such a prodigious alteration in her heart, I shall not despair, but I can cease loving her. But alas the worst is, I do still love her and she loves not me; miserable wretch that I am (added this afflicted Prince) I did foresee it was an easier matter to be unfaithfull unto a dead Lover, than to a living, and yet I would not let Mandana know that I was not dead: But alas (continued he) how could I ever imagin, that a Princess who has seen the greatest Princes in the world at her feet, and yet preserved her fidelity, should now be perfidious? How could I ever think that she, who for the Love of me, had rejected the King of Assyria, the Prince Mazares, the King of Pontus, and Ariantes himself, should the very next day think me in my grave, exclude me out of her heart, and memory, and become the most ungratefull and most unjust person in the world? But Sir, (said Meliantes) I do not understand why any thing I have said unto you, or any thing you have seen, should so excessively trouble you: No, no Meliantes, (replied Cyrus) I cannot be mistaken, I know the very bottome of Mandanas heart, and I am so sure that she had some pleasing thoughts in her mind when I saw her, that it is impossible but I should be infinitely grieved. I thought that after all I had done for her, she should not so soon forget me, but that she should acknowledge my services by a long continued sorrow for my death, and yet I find her thoughts far different, and in such a condition, that if our design be not suddenly executed, I shall hear of her being at some publick Diversion, and that she has recovered all her joyes and pleasant humours again.

Oh Heavens! that I should ever see this day? is it possible I should outlive the sight which I have seen? Yes, yes (added he upon second thoughts) I will live to be revenged upon her that does not lament my death, and to kill my happy Rivall who hath driven me out of the heart of that unjust Princess, and who thinks himself my successor in her affection: But perfidious Anaxaris, as long as I live, thou shalt never enjoy Mandana. Afterwards this afflicted Prince fell into many bitter expressions, and was so instant with Meliantes and Mereontes to hasten their design, that he inspired them with fresh zeal to the Execution of it. And indeed they did transact their business so well that all the Sauromattan Captains did not only assure him of all the Sauromates but of the Gelons also. So as now halving nothing to do but to make it known unto Cressus and Mazares that Cyrus was living, and to agree with them upon an hour of these severall assaults which they thought fit to be made all at once, they propounded it as the safest expedient, that Meliantes should desire a Herald of Ariantes, to go and see a friend of his, who was really a prisoner on the other side, and that in the mean time, he who went with this Herald should speak in private with Cressus and Mazares, or if that could not be, then to Chrysantes or Feraulas, and acquaint them that Cyrus was living, and inform them of the state of things. But all the difficulty being to find a faithful man for this employment whom they might trust, and finding none, they changed their intentions, and resolved that Mereontes should disguise himself, and go into the Camp of Mazares: For said he, I can do it without any danger, since if any of Thomyris side do stop me, they will know me and take me to be one of their own side, and if any of Cyrus his men take me, they will carry me unto Cressus Page 194 and Mazares: After this Mereontes without more delay, disguised himself, and after he had received all necessary instructions from Cyrus, for the Execution of the work, he departed.

But that those Princes might give the more credit unto what he should tell them, Cyrus writ a little note of three lines only unto Mazares, which Mereontes might tear, or swallow, in case he were stopped by any of Thomyris men; and before he went, Cyrus maugre all his sorrows, courted his fidelity with a million of obliging expressions. But they were needless, for Mereontes of himself was wholly devoted unto the service of this Prince, and did negotiate the business with so much ingenuity and fidelity, that though he was stopped several times, yet he happily went his journey; for his habit being of that Nation of which there was some in both Arlmies, he was able to tell any side that he was of theirs, and he went through all the difficulties so fortunately that he got unto Cressus and Mazares: the truth is, he did not so much surprize them as he expected. For Feraulas an hour before, was returned from the Tents Royall, and had told them, that certainly the head which Thomyris had plunged in bloud was not the head of Cyrus, but of Spitridates: So has Mereontes giving Mazares that Letter which Cyrus wrote unto him, they had noe reason to doubt any thing he told them afterwards, also they knew him to be that valiant Sauromate, whose life Cyrus saved from the flames, after he had overcome him.

But it was very observable, that though all the hopes of Mazares did dy, by the reviving of Cyrus, yet he was so generous as to rejoice at it: The truth is, that to uphold his virtue, he had recourse unto his Love, and his hopes of seeing Mandana soon delivered; made him joyce that Cyrus lived. And to let the height of his generosity appear, he endeavoured all manner of waies to hasten the execution of a design, which he thought being retarded, might ruin Cyrus, who being in a place where he might be discovered he was in abundance of Danger. So as consulting with Cressus and finding it expedient to impart the business unto the most considerable friends of Cyrus, they sent for the Prince Artamas, Myrsiles, Tygranes, Intaphernes, Gabrias, Gadates, Atergatis, Indathorses, Hydaspes, and Chrysantes.

But in the interim, Cressus and Mazares caused Mereontes and Feraulas to tell them all they knew concerning Cyrus and Mandana, both of them sadly bewailing the sad resentments of that Princess when she heard of the supposed Death of Cylrus. Sirs (said Mereontes) there is more need of bewailing that great Prince, than that Princess: At least he thinks her two much comforted after his supposed death; for he saw her in a Coach before his Tent, and saw so few signs of sorrows in her face, that he saw her smile as she talked unto Martesia. And to tell you trully, I know not how she can excuse her self for being so soon comforted; but I am sure never Lover was so afflicted as the illustrious Cyrus was when he saw it, Alas, alas (cried cut Feraulas) it is with much injustice, and the joyes which he saw in the face of that Princess, ought infinitely to oblige hm: For generous Mereonltes, that same day when Cyrus saw her, was the day when her Tent was on fire, and when they carried her into another, and that same day in the morning, I did let her know by Martesia, that it was the head of Spitridates wch she saw, and not of Cyrus; so as it is no wonder if having some hopes of that Princes life she was not so sad as when her own eyes told her that he was dead: And when he saw her smile a little, doubless it was an effect of her affection to him: For Martesia telling her how I was disguised, and amongst the multitude to see her pass by, she knew mee, and shewed mee unto Martesia, making a little signe with her head unto me, to testifie she was glad of the good news which I sent her, and not being able to think that Cyrus was living without the appearance of some joy in her eyes, me thought indeed I saw her smile a little: Oh Feraulas, (said Mereontes) how welcome will this news be unto Cyrus? for I am fully perswaded that from the first day of his loving Mandana unto this houre, nothing hath hapned which ever made him half so miserable as this accident: Sir, (replied he) I can so easily justifie this great Princess, that I have a great desire to return withall the haste I can to undeceive my illustrious Master of this Errour. Indeed, I think it requisite (replied Cressus) that you return with Mereontes: For considering the depth of his resentments, perhaps he will imagine that Mereontes flatters him. Then whilst Page 195Cressus, Mereontes, and Feraulas were thus talking, and expecting the coming of those Princes whom they had sent for, Mazares was entertaining himselfe with his own thoughts, and carefully examined them, lest his love should be too strong for his vertue.

At last, all the illustrious friends of Cyrus being come, and hearing with incredible joy that he was alive, they loadned Mereontes with a million of Carresles, and thanked him as heartily as if he had raysed him from the dead. But Mereonltes being all generosity, stopped them, and said, that it was not he who had saved the life of Cyrus, nor that would set him at liberty, but that it was an illustrious Assyrian called Meliantes. At the very name of Meliantes, Hidaspes changed colour, and could not choose but testifie his a stonishment. How (said he and Gabrias both) is it Meliantes who was heretofore of Alfenes, is it he unto whom Cyrus is a Prisoner? Yes (replied Mereontes) he who hath the Destiny of Cyrus in his hands is the same Meliantes, who I understand did meet the faire Arpasia upon the banks of a little River, and who began his acquaintance with her, by relating how Sesostris had heretofore erected a stately Collumn unto his glory, upon which Collumn Arpasia did sit. Hidaspes being extreemly vexed that Cyrus should be so obliged unto his Rival, his resentments of it were beyond expressions: but being generous, he assured the Princes that since he had promised fidelity unto Cyrus, he would keep it.

After which they resolved to send in all hast unto Artabatis, who brought up the puissant Auxiliaties which Ciaxares sent, to the end that things might be so contrived, that at the very same time the Sauromates and the Gelons departed from the Army of Thomyris unto the Tents Royall, to try if they could deliver Mandana, they might fall upon Ariantes in three places at once.: And that Artabatis dividing his Troops, might fall upon Andramites with one part, and send another to encamp themselves between the Tents Royal, and the Camp of Thomyris, and so cut off communication between these two places, whilst Cyrus was fighting with the Gelons and Sauromates against the rest, with orders to relieve, if need required.

But since all this would require some time, Mereontes did not return, untill it was known that Artabatis had received these orders, and promised exact obedience; and untill he had taken a punctuall measure for the march of those Troops which were to encamp themselves between the Tents Royall, and the Camp of Thomyris. The difficulty was, that Myrsiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Hydaspes, who had each of them a Mistress in that place, would by all means joyne themselves with Cyrus, and fight next him: And indeed, though Cressus told them it was not expedient they should go, lest they should be taken, and prejudice that Prince, and discover him, yet they were resolved upon it. Yet the last of of these could not take that resolution without great agitation of spirit, in a thought that he should there meet with a Rivall unto whom Cyrus owed his life and liberty. Artamas also had a great mind to go unto Cyrus, if he could have gone without prejudice to his side: but since he thought that he should do better service in the Army then in the Tents Royall, he restrained his desires.

As for Indathirses, he much desired he might fight in the sight of Cyrus, but a generous thought made him resolve to go, and assault Thomyris even in her very Tents. As for Feraulas, he was resolved to go with Mereontes, and so did Chrijsantes.

But whilst these things thus passed, and whilst all these brave and gallant men were preparing themselves to go and fight for Cyrus, for Mandana, and for all the rest of the illustrious Captives, there passed things of great importance in the Tents Royall. Thomyris, the more she considered the state of her fortune, the more miserable she found her selfe: and the death of Cyrus taking at once from her the object both of her love, and of her revenge, her soule conceived a most horrid hatred both of Mandana, and of her selfe, which did in such a cruell man|ner torment her, that her intellects were not very free. As for Ariantes, since he saw Mandana was somewhat lesse melanchollick, he was abundantly joyed, so as he was in greater hopes, and Mandana in lesse persecution. Yet she being of a generous soule, she was extreemly sad at the misfortune of Araminta, when she Page 196 heard of Spitridates his death: Also, not knowing yet where Cyrus was, and not being so much joyed as not to doubt his death, she was far from thinking her selfe in any happy condition, although Feraulas had put her in great hopes by Martesia, so as she stood in need of Doralisa's consolation, who for her particular had the comfort of Andramites being far from her.

As for Meliantes, since he had sometimes the liberty to see Arpasia, and hoped for much protection from Cyrus, he was in a happier condition than ever he was, since the time that Argelise arrived at Alfenes, to interrupt his felicity. But for Cyrus, he was in a worse condition then ever; as oft as it came into his imagination that Mandana should smile when she thought him dead, and so soon after the barborous act of Thomyris, he thought that he had all the reason in the world to grieve. Truly (said he one day unto Meliantes) had Mandana changed her affection when she had some sparks of jealousy of the Princesse Araminta, and had bestowed it upon the King of Pontus, I should have thought her more excusable. But that she should smile the very next day after she knew of my death, in a time when she was satisfied with my passion, and believed that I lost my life because I would continue faithfull, and slighted a great Queen because I would be constant unto her, this adventure is so strangely terrible, that if these eyes of my own had not seen it, I could never have believed it, and yet alas now I cannot doubt it: Oh heavens! what a strange alteration is in her heart, since she was in Sinope, and there thought me dead? In those happy dayes she lamented me, she sighed and shed teares, and seemed to refuse all comforts; Yet then, I had scarcely done any thing for her, I had not so much as told her that I loved her, and yet she did all that reason required she should. But alas now, when I may justly demand a recompence for my million of services, and when I have thus long loved her the most fervently and constantly that was possible, she can smile, and perhaps so quite forget me, that she never thinks upon the miserable Artamenes, or the unfortunate Cyrus.

Ah Mandana, unjust Mandana! is it possible I should ever have such cause to upbraid you? Can I live, and not go into the midst of your Guards? and in the very presence of Thomyris and Ariantes, proclaim you the most ungrateful person in the world? No no, Meliantes, I cannot live, unlesse Mandana know that I am living, and unlesse she know that I saw her smile when she thought me dead: I am ashamed that I should have more prudence then love, and my passion must this very day make it appear that I am fuller of Love, then Prudence. Oh Meliantes (continued he) you must needs invent some way to convey a Letter from me unto Mandana; for if you do not, I will go my self and chide her extreemly for her poor affection to me. Meliantes did what he could to avert him from this design; for since he could not deliver this Letter to Mandana's owne hand, because he never used to see her, he feared lest some unlucky accident should happen which might ruine this Prince, and spoile the great design which was ready almost for execution, which most apparently would set both Cyrus and Mandana at li|berty, and which would ruine Thomyris and Ariantes, so as he used the utmost of his arguments and perswasions to turn his intention: but since the love of this Prince was above all these considerations, and his resentments above his love, he he would not follow the advice of Meliantes, though he knew it reasonable: so as Meliantes fearing least he should steal out, and go unto Mandana himself, he promised to do his best to deliver his Letter unto her.

So Cyrus calling for Pen and Paper, he writ presently unto Mandan, but he writ when he was so full of tumultuous thoughts, that his wit was never so confused as then; he never so much as stopped nor stayed to give it any method, but writ so fast, that his hand had much ado to follow his fancy; and not at all consulting with his heart, he expressed himselfe in all the terms that both an incensed and respective Lover could invent. After which, sealing up this Letter, he gave it unto Meliantes, who sent the very same hour unto Niside, and entreated her to deliver it unto Martesia, to the end she might give it unto Mandana with all possible secresie. Niside she gave it unto Martesia, and Martesia unto Mandana. But since Niside knew not who sent it, because Meliantes thought it not expedient that she should know how Cyrus was alive, though he knew her very discreet Page 197 she could not tell Martesia, so as Martesia gave this Letter unto Mandana in the presence of Araminta: And betwixt them two all manner of Ceremonies were balnished, unless upon certain occasions when their qualities would not dispense with them: So that Mandana receiving this Letter in presence of Araminta, she was extreemly impatient to see whether it came from Feraulas, and whether he had heard any thing which might confirm her hopes of Cyrus being alive: so as after she had asked Araminta leave to read this Letter, she did so, not bethinking her self that she had never said any thing unto this Princess of all that Feraulas had acquainted her withall.

On the other side, Araminta thinking this Letter could be nothing but some advertisement concerning Mandana's delivery, she desired that she might see it, in hopes that perhaps something was sent unto Mandana concerning Spitridates. So that fixing her eyes upon this Letter which Mandana hastily opened, with an earnest desire to see what was in it. It was no sooner opened, but Araminta knew it to be the hand of Cyrus: and judging at the very first that if Cyrus was living, Spitridates must be dead, and that there was a mistake in their resemblance, she gave such a dolorous and loud screek, that the Guards which were at the other end of the Tent, did believe that some ill accident had chanced unto this Princess, so as coming to her as well as Hesionide, Doralise and Martesia, they found her so perplexed, that they knew her sorrow was excessive.

But the worst was, Mandana knowing at the very first the hand of Cyrus as well as Araminta, she was so pleasingly surprized, and her mind was so wholly taken up, that taking no notice of Araminta, she began to read, and read on untill the Guards were come up unto them: Then recollecting her selfe, she presently put up the Letter, yet she could not put it up so soon but the Guards saw it.

In the mean time, Araminta seeing so many men about her, did make a sign unto them that she was not well, and that she would have them retire, which according to their respects they did: but since what they had seen had filled them full of curiosity, they observed these Princesses very closely, each of them with intentions to report what they had seen and heard, unto those upon whom they depended; for there was some of them who were more for Thomyris, than Ariantes, and some also who were more for Ariantes, then Thomyris.

After they were gone out of the Tent, they began to listen and hearken very attentively: and to tell you truly, they might easily know that this Letter contained some matter of great importance: For as soon as ever they were retired, the sad Araminta after a deep sigh, turned towards Mandana, and holding out her hand; I beseech you Madam (said she unto her) let me see whether I must live, or dye, by shewing me the Letter which you received; for if my eyes have not deceived me, I must dye, and there is nothing which can hinder me.

Mandana was much unresolved what to do: for should shee shew her the Letter, she should as good as tell her Cyrus was living, and by consequence, that Spitridates was dead. On the other side, should she not shew it unto her, she did as good as tell her the same, since considering the familiarity that used to passe between them, it was not likely Mandana should hide any thing from Araminta, unlesse some such thing as would afflict her. Also Mandana seeing that she knew it to be the hand of Cyrus, it was all one, as if she shewed her the Letter. However, she must return an answer unto the great and unfortunate Princess, and so she did, with as much discretion as possible.

The condition wherein I see you are (said she unto her when she asked a sight of the Letter) does move me unto so much pitty, that I would do any thing to lessen your sorrows: therefore I must not put my self to the hazard of aggravating them; as perhaps I might by shewing you this letter: for since I have not yet read it over, I cannot tell whether it intimate unto me that the Army of the King my Father is cut in pieces, and whether we are exposed unto perpetuall Captivity: and therefore I beseech you let me read this Letter in private, before I shew it unto you; and resolve with your self if you can, to let me forbear the reading of it untill it be night; for since you see the shriek you gave, did put the Guards into some suspicion, and moves them to watch us more narrowly, therefore it is discretion to forbear a while.

Page 198 Alas Madam, replied Araminta, you may as well tell me that I must dye, as refuse me what I aske. For if the writing which I saw was the hand of Cyrus, that's enough: And therefore Madam, I have no more to say unto you, but that since I am not able to govern my sorrows, I will go and hide my selfe in my own Tent, lest I should prejudice you.

In saying so, the sad Araminta rose up, and went into a Tent which joyned unto Mandana's, whether that Princess followed her: And they were no sooner there, but Araminta giving her selfe over unto sorrow, her expressions would have tendered hearts that were as hard and pittlesse as stones. Mandana now would have done her the same office which she received from her, when she endeavoured to comfort her, when Thomyris shewed her that Tragical spectacle: But alas, Araminta's soule was not in any condition of receiving Consolation; and therefore Mandana conceived, that since her sorrow was so excessive, it was better to let her know the truth now, then leave her in a languishing suspicion of that which she must one day know: So as no longer opposing her sorrows, but condoling with her, Araminta was confirmed in the opinion which she had before, that Spitridates was dead: so as being out of all hopes, her sorrow had no bounds and her soule was so over-swelled, that never thinking it might prejudice Mandana, she cried out so loud, that all those who were in the next Tent, might heare her complaints.

Alas (said she) could I see the unfortunate Spitridates dead, and I live? Is it possible so great, and so virtuous a Prince should be so cruelly treated both by Fortune and by Thomyris? After this Araminta was silent, and her Teares did flow in such abundance, that not being able to weep, to sigh, and to complain all at once, she ceased her complaining: and during her sad silence, it was easie to see she suffered abundance of paine; and there was to be seen in her face such signs of excessive sorrow, that she would have moved the most insensible soule unto pitty: her face was wholly changed, a mortall palenesse was in her cheeks, her looks sad enough to draw tears from the hardest eyes; and the greatnesse of her grief did so appeare in all her actions, that Mandana was afraid lest she should take some sad resolution in hand: For Araminta being naturally as wise, and prudent a person as any in the world, the disorder of her spirit seemed the more strange: For after she had been a while silent, she began to call to memory the things which had hapned unto Spitridates, and to speak of them very earnestly: so as heaping up all the misfortunes of that Prince, she accused the King of Pontus, though dead, for the losse of Spitridates: Presently after, she would accuse Arsamones, and sometimes she would accuse her selfe. The truth is (did shee say) I should either not have suffered the affection of this Prince, or else should have better acknowledged it; for unfortunate Araminta hadst thou been more prudent and considerate, he had not died, nor needest thou to have been put to the necessity of dying with him.

But for all that (continued she) It is fit thou shouldst make it appear that thou art worthy the love of Spitridates, and make thy own grief enough to take away thy life, without recourse either unto sword, or poyson: think upon the grandure of his affection, of his generosity and constancy. Remember it was for thy interest that he suffered so many imprisonments, forsook so many Crowns rather then forsake thee: and for the love of thee, had exiled himselfe from a place where he might have been happy, hadst not thou made him miserable: Consider, that though thou didst deny him all things, yet his passion was still the same: and since thou hast been the cause of his death, courageously follow him, and the more to incite thee unto it, consider that it is a shame for thee to live. But I beseech you Madam (said Mandana unto her in a low voyce) call to memory those reasons which you gave me, when we beheld the sad spectacle which Thomyris shewed us. Ah Madam, cried out Araminta (not considering she should not speak of Cyrus so loud) I must needs reject your Councell as you rejected mine, and I beseech you pardon me, if I grieve at the life of Cyrus, since such is the will of Fate, I cannot heare of his being alive, but I must at the same time heare of Spitridates being dead: I beseech you Madam (said Mandana) speak as little of that Prince as you can, lest you should discover his being alive unto some who may do him Page 199 hurt; for you know that there are many eyes and ears over us, and they may hear what you say unto the next Tent. I beseech you Madam pardon me, said the sad Araminta) if I have said any thing which I should not: For alas I cannot govern my grief, but I must needs complain my self to death, and yet I think I cannot complain long: For after all these misfortunes which are fallen upon my family; after the losse of the King my Brother; and after I have seen Spitridates dead, I should deserve these misfortunes, if I did endure them.

After this, Mandana gave a thousand tender, obliging, and discreet expressions unto Araminta, and that miserable Princesse did answer her so sorrowfully, that she took away from Mandana much of her joy to see that Cyrus was living. But at last, Mandana conceiving Hesionide to be the most fit to give any comfort unto Araminta: and thinking it not good to make the Guards over curious, shee came into the Tent again, she left her, and went into her own Tent again: But as soon as she was there, she could not choose but read the Letter which Cyrus writ: yet she was as careless as possible, lest the Guards who stood at the entrance into her Tent, should see her read it: And to that end she desired Doralise and Martesia to stand before her whilst she read these words.

MADAM,

Since my death hath been very indifferent unto you, I doubt not but my life will be so also: and I am confident you will be as backward in your joys, that I am living, as you were forward in comforting your selfe after you thought me dead. I must ingenuously confesse unto you, that it is more to be revenged upon your infidelity then for any other reason that I acquaint you, Cyrus is not dead as you believed. The truth is, his life is no happinesse unto him. For having seen you smile that day you changed your Tent, Death will be much more sweet unto him, then a life in which he lives not in your heart. For Madam, one is not so soon comforted after the losse of a person whom one loved: and the little thought which you had of my death makes me so sensible and sad, that doubtlesse I shall ere long give you an occasion to rejoyce the second time at my Ruine: Yet I will do what I can to live, that I may hinder my Rivall from triumphing over my misfortune, and thriving by your inconstancy; and doubtlesse I shall do all this by rendring you into the hands of the King your Father. When this is done, Madam, my only businesse is to dye; for I have no reason to believe, that a man whose death is so indifferent unto you, can ever give you any satisfaction. Yet I will keep my respect & my Love unto the last of my days, and I will be revenged of your ingratitude only upon my Rivall, and your Enemies. These Madam are the resolutions of the revived Cyrus, who I thinke did merit to be longer lamented by her, of whom he ever had such tender thoughts, and to whom (as unjust and perfidious as she is) he alwayes paid the whole devotion of his heart.

CYRUS.

The reading of this Letter did so much surprize Mandana, that shee called for Doralisa and Martesia to shew it unto them: and they obeying her, they did not so well hide the Letter, but the Guards did see it; and thinking it to be the same which caused Araminta to cry out, some of them went to acquaint Thomyris, and others to acquaint Ariantes with it, not doubting but that there was something of extraordinary consequence in it.

Moreover, since there was some who confusedly over-heard the complaints of Araminta, wherein the name of Cyrus was brought in, they added this which Page 200 they heard unto that which they had seen. Thus were Thomyris and Ariantes both at one time acquainted, that Mandana some way, or other had received Letters which were in all likelihood of great importance: For the Guards neglected not the least circumstance, but told them of the great shriek which Araminta gave at the sight of it: The excessive sorrow wherein she was: her complaints after she was in her Tent, the name of Cyrus pronounced, and the earnestnesse wherewith Mandana read this Letter after she was returned into her own Tent: So as making no question, but there was some businesse of consequence in this Letter, they began to consider upon the businesse.

The Queen presently after sent for her brother; he came, and they began to consult what might be the cause of Araminta's sorrow. At the first Thomyris came neer the truth, for she thought this Letter imported that Spitridates was dead. But Ariantes considering that Mandana was of late lesse sad then ordinary, he told it unto Thomyris, though he could not devise why Araminta should thus redouble her sorrows: Yet knowing that there was a resemblance between Cyrus and Spitridates, a thought came into his head which strangely troubled his heart: Yet since hee knew not that Cyrus had given Spitridates that rich suit of Arms, which this Prince wore, and which made him to be taken for Cyrus; he was more quiet.

As for Thomyris, since she only sought for a pretence to persecute Mandana, she told Ariantes, that absolutely she would see that Letter which that Princesse had received, and would know the cause of Araminta's sorrows, and whether that would give any light unto the rest, saying that she would go immediately unto the Princess under colour of a civill visit: And Ariantes concurring with her opinion, Thomyris did go unto Araminta's Tent, that Prince waiting upon her; where they found Mandana was returned, and where Arpasia was come also upon reports of her sorrow.

In the mean time, this sudden coming of Thomyris and Ariantes did so surprize Mandana, as was easie for them to imagine that there was some considerable thing in the wind.

On the other side Araminta, whose mind was all upon Spitridates, whose head Thomyris had plunged so in blood, she no sooner saw this Queen, but the fancy of this fearful object coming into her mind, her grief was so great, that never thinking upon either Cyrus, or Mandana, shee was not Mistress of her first thoughts: but giving a great shriek, she turned away her head from the sight of a Queen who was so full of cruelty: So as Thomyris who ever found Araminta very civil, and discreet in all her actions and words, she was extremely surprized at her behaviour. Yet drawing neer the Bed on which she lay, and beginning to speak; Madam (said Thomyris unto her) you receive my civilities in so strange a manner, as I cannot choose but aske the reason of it? Since I do not value life (replied Araminta in a violent manner) I have nothing to care for: and therefore Madam I will not tell you neither what afflicts me, nor what makes my sorrows swell at the sight of you, nor why I resolve to dye: But to acknowledg your Civilities, I will tell you, that if you do not give over your thirst after illustrious blood, nor deliver the Princesse Mandana whom you detain by a most unjust and cruell War, you will make your selfe the object of mens hatred, and the Gods revenge. More then this Madam, expect not from the miserable Araminta: Let her alone with the sorrows of her soule without further diving into the cause of them, and let her expect that death which she desires, as the only thing that can give her any comfort.

Araminta having spoken these words, was silent, and was so drowned in sorrows, that though she had desired to speak more, yet her teares and sighs did so stifle her, that it was impossible. In the mean time, Thomyris, who was not used to such entertainment, blusht for anger: And turning towards Mandana, after she had looked upon Ariantes: It is you Madam (said she unto her) that must acquaint me with the cause of this Princess sorrows; for I know that you received the Letter which brought her the news which afflicts her: Therefore Madam, never offer to deny a thing which I do most certainly know, but shew this Letter unto me, for I will see it, since I have power enough to make my selfe be obeyed.

Page 201Mandana hearing Thomyris say so, was in a strange perplexity, for she knew very well the danger that there was in shewing this Letter unto Thomyris, or in telling her that Cyrus was living, and in the Tents Royall: So as in this urgent necessity of an answer, she would endeavour to try if she could take this Letter out of her pocket, and beginning to answer: As for the Letter you speak of (replied Mandana) I cannot shew it unto you, because I gave it back unto the man of the Guard who brought it unto me; but least we should aggravate the sorrows of the Queen of Pontus, if it will please your Majesty to go into my Tent, I will acquaint you with the cause of them.

Since Mandana spoke this with a confident and pleasant look, Thomyris beleived that she spoke sincerely: And Ariantes desiring to keep Thomyris from doing any thing which might distaste that Princess, he desired her to do so. So as the Queen of the Massagettans, passed from the Tent of the sad Araminta, unto that of Mandana's.

But in passing from one Tent unto another, Mandana, who followed Thomyris, and who observed that Doralisa and Martesia were at the dore of the Tent, she hastily took the Letter out of her pocket to give it unto one of them. But as she took it out with much haste, and would have given it either unto Doralisa or unto Martesia, these two, not knowing unto which of them she would give it, because she made no signe to signifie her intention, they both advanced to her at once: So that Mandana parting from the Letter a little too hastily and soon, in Lien of leaving it in the hands either of Doralisa or Martesia, it fell down; and fell so unluckily, that when these two Ladies stooped hastily to take it up, Thomyris turning her head to see whether Mandana followed, she saw it in the hands of Martesia, and viewed upon it immediatly.

As soon as Mandana saw this Letter in the hands of Thomyris, Oh Heavens! how vexed she was? but there being no remedy, she resolved to take this cross adventure patiently, and pray to the Gods that this accident might not bring Cylrus under the power of Thomyris, so as she did strive to reassume her confidence of spirit, and to follow that Queen into her Tent; where she was no sooner come but seeing Thomyris ready to open the Letter, and by consequence to know the hand of Cyrus, (as well as Ariantes, who had often seen his hand) she began to speak with much Courage, Magnanimity, Prudence, and Discretion. I cannot tell Madam, (said she unto her) what thoughts you will have when you understand that Cyrus is not dead; but before you do understand it by this Letter which is written unto me. I do protest before all the Gods, that you shall never know by me, from whom I received it. How (said Thomyris, and hasted to open the Letter) is not Cyrus dead? It is possible (said Ariantes) that Cyrus should be living? if so Madam, is it many dayes since you knew it: And that consolation which I hoped for, in Lieu of rejoycing me must afflict me.

Whilst he was speaking thus, Thomyris was reading the Letter which Cyrus, writ unto Mandana, and she read it with such tumultuous and opposite thoughts that it was a great difficulty to reconcile them; for it filled her mind full of wonder, Joy, Anger, Sorrow, and Jealousy. So as being less able to endure the sight of Mandana, when she knew that Cyrus was alive then when he thought him dead, she shut up the Letter before she had read it out, and turning towards Mandana, though you are resolved Madam (said she unto her) not to tell who brought you this Letter, yet I shall find out away to make you confess it: You may easily find out many waies to persecute me Madam (replied Mandana) and to make me dy; but you can never find out any way to make me confess any thing that may prejudice Cyrus: And you shall never see me do any thing (replied Thomyris in a great rage) that shall please Mandana.

Afterwards, this Queen told Ariantes, that he must double the Guards upon this Princess, and upon all the rest of the Ladies: Also to let no communication be between them: And accordingly this order being observed the very same hour they parted all the Princesses, for Araminta remained alone with Hesioneide in her Tent: Mandana in hers with Doralise and Martesia, and all the rest with their own women. So as by this means, it was impossible for Niside, unto whom Meliantes had delivered the Letter of Cyrus, to send back unto him, and to advertise Page 202 him of this great disorder, of which he was ignorant, because he was then very busy in a secrec conference between him, and the Sauromattan Captaines, with whom Mereontes, and he had treated.

In the mean time, Thomyris and Ariantes were no so sooner parted from their Tents, but they opened this Letter, and read it with strange agitation of spirit, though with different resentments. For Thomyris out of some resentments of Love, was very glad that Cyrus was not dead, and that he complained against Mandana, though otherwise she would have been very sorry for the resurrection of such an Enemy, and that he should be so tender towards her Rival. But for Ariantes, though his generosity had moved him to compassionate his Rivals death, yet he was extremely sorry to hear he was living, and all the complaints he made against Mandana, did not comfort him.

However, both Thomyris and Ariantes finding by this Letter, that Cyrus was alive, and that he either was, or had been in the Tents Royall, since he told Mandana that he saw her smile, that day she changed her Tent, they endeavoured to secure his person: but the great difficulty was, how to know where this great Prince was.

The truth is, fortune favoured their design, for as they were thus consulting three prisoners were brought in which Agathyrus had taken and sent unto Thomyris: The one of them was the Prince Atergatis disguised in a Massagettan habit. The second was Intaphernes, and the third Feraulas, who had a Letter about him from Gabrias unto Meliantes. So as now not doubting but that Meleantes knew where Cyrus was, Thomyris commanded the Captain of her Guard to go that very houre and arrest him, and to search his Tent very well to see if they could find Cyrus; for the Letter from Gabrias, gave some suspicion of such a thing: But she gave strict Commands, that whatsoever he did to bring him alive, and if he did resist, yet none to kill him.

After which, she commanded that Intaphernes and Atergatis should be strictly guarded; as for Feraulas, she would see him, and examine him what he knew concerning his Master: And the sooner to induce him unto a confession she spoke unto him at first with all imaginable sweetness: Afterwards she threatened him, and at last did speak unto him in so much fury, that Feraulas was extremely afraid lest Cylrus should fall into the hands of a Princess, whose passions were so violent. But whilst Thomyris employed all her unprofitable menaces upon Feraulas to make him discover where his Master was, and whilst Ariantes by order of Thomyris was gon to set double Guards about the Tents Royall, that none might go out, or in without express permission from the Queen; Cyrus and Meliantes were not without their shares of trouble; for though Niside could not advertise Meliantes of all passages, and though Meliantes had been so busy that he saw none that could inform him, yet one of his Domestiques telling him that Thomyris and Ari- had been in Mandana's Tent, and that Orders were given for a strict guard upon that Princess, he feared (and with reason) that the Letter which Cyrus writ was discovered, and that it was known he was living; so as not conceiving it fit to conceal his fears from that Prince, he told him all his thoughts to the end he might prepare himself for going out of the Tents Royall the night following, or at least to change his Tent, and to go into the Tent of one of those Sauromattan Captains who were of their intelligence. But since it must be night before this could be done, they had not time enough for it, for as they were in consultation what to do, the Captain of the Guard came with fifty followers, so that since they could not defend themselves in a Tent as in houses, all that Meliantes could do was to go towards the Captain of the Guard, who asked for him from Thomyris, assuring Cyrus that the would sooner dy than discover him, and hoping that the Captain of the Guard would be contented with arresting him, but it was otherwise: For in Lieu of being contented with Meliantes, they would enter into the Tent from whence he came. Meliantes seeing this, he got between the dore of the Tent and the Captain of the Guard, and drawing his sword, and stopped him purposely to give Cyrus so much time as to get out at another dore of she Tent, and get into the Tent of that Sauromattan Captain, of which they had spoken: For as luck was, Cyrus was disguised in a Massagettan habit ever since he came to Page 203 Meliantes could hope for no more, then to gain so much time, as till Cyrus got out. But as that Prince would have done so, he found that the Captain of the guard had beset the Tent round about; and it chanced so, that the Prince Ariantes passed accidentally that way as Cyrus was going out. So as seeing an impossibility any way to escape, he chose that place to get out at, where happily he might kill his Rival before he was killed himself; for being in the mind he was, and considering what minds Thomyris and Mandana were in, he had much rather dy, than be a Prisoner unto that Queen, or his Rival: so as this being his resolution, he drew his sword; and calling Meliantes unto him, that they might fight both together, he went out of the Tent, accompanied with that generous Assyrian, and four or five of his men; and so sharply fell upon Ariantes, that though the Captain of the guard had beset the Tent round, yet those who were on that side where Cyrus went out, could not hinder him from having a blow at that Prince, after he had severall times called him ungratefull Anaxaris, Persidious Anaxaris. Ariantes being on horseback and Cyrus on foot, the blow which he made at that Prince did not hit as it was intended, for the Horse of that Prince being curvetting as the blow was made, it was the Horse which received his blow in the flank, and who not being able to endure the fury of the stroak, did violently bound, and brook the sword of Cyrus. Meliantes seeing this, out of his herique generosity, he gave his unto this illustrious Hero, and took another from one of those who followed: After which Ariantes having time to know him to be his Rival, he went towards him, with intention to end all the differences by his death; but his horse being much wounded, he fell, and his Rider also fell under him, who perhaps saved the life of his Master by his own death For in this Interim, the Captain of the Guard with all his companions came out of the Tent, and so surrounded both Cyrus, and his brave Assyrian, that they hindered them from falling upon Ariantes.

In the mean time, since Cyrus would not render himself, and since the Captain of the Guard would not let him be killed, because Thomyris had expressly commanded to bring him alive, Cyrus seconded by Meliantes, killed so great a number of them, that when Ariantes was disengaged from under his horse, he did not think it fit to insist upon such strict orders from Thomyris; so as thrusting in among those who would have taken Cyrus, he fell upon him with much vigour; Cyrus warded the blow which he made at him, and returned another so sharply that he was forced to step back. But whilst things were in this condition, and whilst Cyrus and Meliantes could hardly avoid death; considering the number of their assaulters, and their resolution not to be taken; Thomyris, whose impatency and inquietude brought her out of her Tent appeared on horse back: So as seeing this combat, and hearing the cause, she advanced into the midst of the tumult, forbidding her men from killing Cyrus, and commanding Cyrus to render himself: But Ariantes being strangely incensed against the obstinate resistance of this Prince, valued not the command which Thomyris gave; but fell again upon his Rival who had laid the captain of the Guard dead at his feet: But when Thomyris saw this, and observed that Cyrus did not see Ariantes: She cried out, take heed of your self Cylrus, and guard the blow which one of my rebellious Subjects is making at you.

At these words, Cyrus who knew well the voice of Thomyris, turned himself about, and saw that Ariantes was making a most furious blow at him, so as he warded the blow: But in the mean time, three or four of those who came with the Queen, fell upon him and layd hold of his Arm, and hindering him from continuing his combat with Ariantes, they presented him unto Thomyris, who was more joyed to see Cyrus in her power, then if she had won a hundred battells, and conquered as many Kingdomes.

In the mean while, Meliantes seeing Cyrus taken, he fell upon Ariantes, who being vexed to the heart that he had not vanquished his Rival, he made a Passe upon the Assyrian: These two, then like two who would have either death or victory, maintained a fight most courageously: Thomyris seeing it, and being extremely angry against the Prince her Brother for disobeying her, and for perpetually opposing of her when she offered to persecute Mandana; she commanded them both to be seized upon, and that both the Prince her Brother, Cyrus, and Meliantes should be carefully guarded: so as since it was an easie matter to take Page 204 two men who were striving one against the other, they were both of them easily arrested: Yet there were some who were friends unto Ariantes, that would have made some stir, but the presence of Thomyris hindered them.

In the mean time, this Queen not knowing well what thoughts to have of Cylrus, she would not speak unto him, but commanded he should be carryed into one of her Tents, and so strongly guarded as that there might be no feare of his escape. As for Meliantes, he and Intaphernes and Atergatis were put together, that one Guard might serve them all. So that when Mereontes, Myrsiles, Christantes, and Hydaspes returned unto the Tents Royall disguised like Massagettans, they found Cyrus a Prisoner, that Meliantes was the like: That Ariantes was arrested: that Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Feraulas were taken, and that Mandana was more strictly guarded than ever: That Thomyris since the imprisonmet of her Brother had changed the Guards of that Princesse: and indeed they knew not how all this sudden alteration came about: So that to have a little time of consideration what to do, they went & concealed themselves in a Tent of one of those Sauromattan Captains with whom Mereontes had treated.

In the mean time, the report of Cyrus being alive did make so great a noise, that the imprisonment of Ariantes did not make a greater. For nothing almost was talked of but Cyrus, and it was so much the talk of every one, that Mandana heard of it by her Guards. The Princess of Bythinia also understood from hers, that Intaphernes was arrested: Istrina heard that Atergatis had the same Destinie: And Arpasia was not ignorant that Meliantes was a prisoner. So as then looking upon him as more miserable then Hydaspes, the tendernes of her heart augmented towards him, and she was sorry to think that she was the cause of such an excellent mans misfortune, who had killed two, which had rendered her most miserable if they had lived: Martesia also for her particular heard that Feraulas was in the hands of Thomyris: and Fate had so disposed of things, that nothing but sorrow and despair was on all sides.

When this News was heard in the Army of Cyrus, there was an Universal murmure: And when it was known in the Army of Thomyris, all those of any reason did apprehend that she would by her violencies against Cyrus, against Mandana, and against the Prince her Brother, force her owne Subjects to arm themselves against her, and joyn with her Enemies.

In the mean time, the great Design which was just ripe, was now not fit to be executed: For this change had made an alteration in their measures; and this great Revolution did so blast the spirits of every one, as that they talked of nothing but what had happened, and what was like to happen. But if persons indifferent were thus perplexed, what is to be thought of persons interested, and amongst them, the Princesse Mandana: For after the sight of that cruell action of Thomyris, when she thought Cyrus was dead, might she not well feare the same now while he was living, and in the power of this incensed Queen? The most pleasing thought she had, was in hopes to see Cyrus unfaithfull; for (said she unto Doralisa and Martesia) since Cyrus is discontented at me, and seems by his Letter to believe that I was not grieved at his death, is it not likely that he will not think himselfe obliged to be faithfull unto one whom he thinks perfidious? and so ceasing his scorn of Thomyris, he may perhaps begin to hate me? But alas (added she) this is the greatest advantage I can expect unto my selfe, if he should do so; for if this unfortunate Prince say true, he loves me still as perfidious as hee thinks me: So as if he continue obstinate still against the cruell Thomyris, perhaps she will cause him to be stabbed in my presence: so as I am in such a condition, as I must inevitably either see Cyrus unfaithfull, or dye: Oh most cruell necessity (cried she out) oh rigorous Fate! unto what miseries have you reserved me, and what strange Torments have you prepared for me? But oh ye most just gods! never let Cyrus accuse me of any inconstancy or ingratitude: Cleer up his spirits I beseech you; open his eyes, and let him see that he wrongs the most faithfull person in the world by suspecting her of any infidelity. But alas (said she, and reprehended her selfe) in wishing that Cyrus should know the constancy of my affection, perhaps I wish his death, and make prayers against his life, since the more he belives me faithfull, the more he will incense the cruell Thomyris. Madam Page 205 (said Doralisa unto her) there hath hapned such wonderful alterations in your life, that me thinks you should not despair of any thing: For Cyrus was thought to be dead in the Bythinian War; He thought you ready to perish in the Conflagration of Sinope; he believed you drown'd when he found Mazares ready to expire; Mazares himselfe thought so a long time; Cyrus was believed so o'ver all Asia, and you your selfe thought you saw him dead with your own eyes.

'Tis true Doralisa (replyed Mandana) that all these so fell out: But it is a much greater difficulty to imagine how I should come happily out of this miserable condition wherein I am: For Cyrus is in the power of a most cruell person, who seemed to rejoyce at his death, vvhoo looked upon that bloody head of Spitridates vvhich she thought vvas his, vvvith much delight: and vvhose soule is inspired with such a violent and furious passion as is ready to prompt her unto any thing.

For my part Madam (replyed Martesia) I cannot imagin that Thomyris will be so cruel unto Cyrus living, as she was to Cyrus dead: For when she thought he had lost his life, perhaps a secret sorrow for his death caused all her rage: and thinking him dead in thoughts of scorn unto her, she was cruell unto him after his death, but I cannot believe she will be so inhumane unto him living; for hopes both flattering and sweetning her spirit, it will allay her cruelty: Also (added Doralisa) when I consider how you got out of the power of the King of Assyria, of Mazares, and of the King of Pontus, you have reason to hope that both Cyrlus and you will get out of the power of Thomyris: Alas Doralisa (said Mandana) Cyrus cannot be his own deliverer, as he might have been mine? And though the Prince Mazares should be as happy as he is brave, and though he should have more generosity then love, yet I have no grounds for any hope, because I believe that if he attempt any thing, the life of Cyrus will be the more in danger, since Thomyris had rather see him dye then delivered. Also it grieves me that his Rivall is a prisoner as well as he: For he being obliged unto him, being generous, and having some power over his own spirit, I might hope if he were at liberty, that he would prevent all sad consequences of Thomyris her passion: But alas! it hath pleased the Gods to deprive me of all relief, and to take all hopes from me.

As Mandana was talking in this sad manner, Hesionide all in tears came, and beseeched this Princesse to go into Araminta's Tent: For though Thomyris had commanded that all the captive Ladies should be severed, yet Araminta was not, by reason of her excessive sorrows.

As much grieved as Mandana was for her own interests, yet she would not deny assistance unto a Princess whom she so much esteemed; but went into her Tent, and found her in a most lamentable condition, for she would never eate any thing since she knew of Spitridates his death: She was grown so weak, and yet had such a violent Feaver, that it was easie to see that her grief would soon ease her of all her payns: Yet her reason was very perfect; and though her voyce was very faint, yet she could expresse her selfe most sensibly unto Mandana: I beg your pardon Madam (said she unto her) for augmenting your sorrows by a sight of mine; yet since I have but a few minutes to live, I hoped that you would give me leave to make one request unto you. Alas Madam (replyed Mandana) My condition is so deplorable, that there is nothing in my power but to lament your misfortunes, and weep with you: Yet I assure you Madam, that there is nothing but things impossible which I would not do for you. My request is (replyed the miserable Araminta) that by the power you have with Ariantes, you will obtain from him that Spitridates and I may have but one Tomb: That you will let the illustrious Cyrus know I leave him all the right which I have unto the Kingdome of Pontus: And that I conjure him to keep in memory that unfortunate Prince who had the glory to resemble him, and dye in his service. But above all Madam, I beseech you, so contrive it, that Death may unite what the cruelty of Fate hath severed, and that Spitridates and Araminta may have but one Grave. I hope Madam (replyed Mandana) that you will not stand in need of my help, and that you will live to erect a Monument unto that illustrious Prince, for whom you grieve. But if you do not, alas Madam I shall not be able to do that Office Page 206 which you desire: For the Prince Ariantes is arrested by orders from Thomyris: The miserable Cyrus is in Fetters, and I am in as great a desire of death as you are. Do thy worst, Fortune, do thy worst (replyed Araminta weakly) and after thou hast taken two Kingdoms from me, deny me a Grave, and deprive me of the only satisfaction which I had left, which was my hope that the Prince whom Spitridates resembled, might be happy. As for you Madam (added she, holding Mandana by the hand) I have nothing to say unto you, since you have occasions enough for your own Tears, and your affliction deserves them. After this, Araminta was silent, and turned to the other side: And about two hours after she fell into such a profound Lethargy, that she never recovered out of it, but only to pronouuce the name of the miserable Spitridates, and dyed patiently. Such a sad augmentation of sorrow as this, filled the imagination of Mandana vvvith all the horrors of death: Yet that of Araminta vvas most vvvorthy of life, and of that passion vvhich possessed her soule: For during that quarter of an hour vvhich she recovered, she vvas full of high expressions: She told Mandana that she did not stand in need of all her patience & constancy to suffer the losse of two Kingdoms, to suffer Exile and imprisonment: but she stood in need of more then all she had, to endure the death of Spitridates. She spoke most obligingly of the Bythinian Princelle: She recommended Hesionide unto her: She beseeched the Gods to pardon her weaknesses and excesse of sorrows: Also she prayed them to unite her spirit unto the spirit of Spitridates. After vvhich, she dyed quietly vvvithout any strugling, or losse of that beauty vvhich rendered her the most charming Princess upon Earth, though that vvas the loveliest of those rare qualities vvhich made her admired.

In the mean time, Mandana endeavoured to do her that office vvhich she desired, and entreated the Physitian of Thomyris vvhoo savv her dye, to be a mediator unto this Queen, that Aramintas Tomb and Spitridates his might be all one: And this man being much moved vvvith compassion, he obtained of Thomyris vvvhat Araminta desired. Thus Death united vvvhat Fortune had separated, and these two illustrious persons vvhoo could not sit upon one Throne, did lye both in one grave. But all this while Ariantes was in most incredible torment, in fears lest Thomyris should take any violent course against Mandana: and his fears of it were such, that hee almost wished her in the power of Cyrus, rather than of Thomyris.

On the other side; Myrsiles was extremely grieved at his Arrest, and that he was not able to do any service unto Mandana, Cyrus, or Doralisa. Intaphernes and Atergatis were as much grieved as he, but Feraulas was incomparably most of all dejected. Meliantes also was vexed that Hydaspes was not a Prisoner, as well as some of those who came upon the same design. The Princesse of Bythinia grieved for the death of her brother for Araminta & for the imprisonment of her Lover. Istrina also was sadly concerned in the affliction of that Princesse, & in the misfortune of Atergatis: And Arpasia was very sad, because Meliantes was a prisoner, and because she knew not where Hydaspes was. But put all the miseries of all these persons together, they were all incomparable to that of Cyrus: For when it came into his thoughts, that his Rivall was a prisoner, because he should not defend the life of Mandana against the fury of Thomyris, his grief was beyond all expression: which way soever he turned his thoughts, he could find no consolation. For if he considered Thomyris as his Enemy, he could not endure his fetters: If he thought upon her as his Lover, she was more odious unto him: If he remembered all his victories, he remembered them with sorrow, since his Fate was changed: If he called to memory the cruelty of Thomyris unto the dead Spitridates, when she took him for himselfe, he prepared himselfe to dye in the same cruell manner: And if he thought upon Mandana, he thought upon her with unimaginable sorrow, since he thought upon her to be unfaithfull, or at least too little sensible of his death, and too soon comforted at it. And yet this sad thought did not lessen his tenderness, nor his affection; but by a most cruell and ingenuous device of Fate, he was all at once both full of anger, tendernes, jealousy, pitty, love and fury: For sometimes he would complain against Mandana, and sometimes he would complain against himself in lieu of her. Presently after, he would curse Ariantes, and instantly after that, he would wish him at liberty: Then would he make imprecations Page 207 against Thomyris, and sometimes against himselfe, charging himselfe with all the miseries of Mandana, with all his own, with all the violences of Thomyris, and also with all the affection which his Rivals bore unto the Princesse whom he adored: so as passing continually from one sad thought unto another, he was in perpetual torment: But the sharpest part of all his miseries was, his opinion that Mandana did love him, or at least did not love him enough. The cruelty of Thomyris did not so much grate upon his soule, as the want of affection in Mandana did; for he was accustomed to see Death in his grimmest look, but he was never used to see Mandana perfidious, or indifferent. Also he had one addition of sorrow more, when he heard of Araminta's death by one of his Guards, and he set that upon the score of his own misfortunes, and began to number them all up. Is it not enough, oh cruell Fate (cried he out) that I should be miserable in my own person? but I must also be so in the persons of those whom I love? Must Spitridates dye because he resembled me, and was my friend? Must Araminta loose her life, because I professed friendship to her? Must Meliantes be imprisoned because he protected me? Must I be miserable because Thomyris loves me? and also because Mandana loves mee not? Fortune makes use of all this variety to torment me, and yet I could support them all, were I assured of the affection of my Princesse: But alas I am far from that happy condition; for since she can soon comfort her selfe after my death, it must needs be concluded that she values not my life, and therefore why should I, unlesse against all reason, in hopes of revenge; I had indeed some hopes that the Oracle had been fulfilled in Spitridates: but Heavens! I feare it is not, since I am under the power of a loving, and yet of an enraged Queen: Mandana is under the power of a proud Rivall, and I am out of Mandana's heart; and therefore I were absolutely out of my wits, if I should hope for any rest, but in Death, yet thanks be unto the Gods, I am not capable of such a weakness.

But whilst Cyrus was reasoning with himselfe in this sad manner, Thomyris was so full of unquiet distempers, as she was not half a quarter of an hour in one mind. Gelonide knowing the very bottom of her heart, she discovered all the tumultuous thoughts of her soule unto her. I perceive Gelonide (said she unto her, seeing her look earnestly upon her) that you desire to dive into my thoughts, but let me tell you, it is very difficult, for they wander upon so many severall subjects, as they continually smother one another: and such is the agitation of my soule, that it would suffer much lesse if I were in the condition of Cyrus: And yet (replyed Gelonide) that Prince is in a very ill condition; and I believe that if your Majestie consider it well, you will find a great difference between your fortune and his. Were I at peace with my self Gelonide (replyed Thomyris) you were in the right: but alas, there is such a Civill war in my heart, that shivers it into pieces; For when I think how this Prince slighted me both under the name of Artamenes and Cyrus, I cannot choose but hate him: And I am resolved to put Mandana to death, to let him see her dead, and then to put him to death also: For if I considler him upon that account, I cannot think upon any punishment which he deserve not, he has scorned me enough to merit a thousand deaths; he hath blasted my glory, he hath made the blood of my Subjects run like Rivers, and he hath caused my sons death. So as looking upon him upon this accompt, and having him in my power, I am often in a mind to tast the sweets of a full revenge.

But alas, these thoughts last but a while: and when I consider Cyrus as the greatest Prince upon Earth, and as the most excellently accomplished man in the whole world, my revenge dyes, and I am ready to excuse him. Yes Gelonide, sometimes I tell my selfe that he loved Mandana before ere he saw me; that he does no wrong unto me in not loving me, and that I am obliged unto him for sparing my life, when he might easily have killed me in the Sauromattan wood: But after all these Considerations, my soule is never the quieter; for the lesse reason I find to accuse Cyrus, the more I find to accuse my selfe: But Gelonide, my greatest grief is, that Cyrus doth most horribly hate me, especially since the time that the violence of my Love and Jealousie did prompt me unto that act of cruelty, which vet I only did, because he had been cruell unto me. But as oft as I thinke upon Cyrus, unto whom I have expressed a thousand testimonies of Love, and Page 208 that he should know of this terrible effect of my hatred, I am vexed beyond my expression: For the truth is, I have a desire to see him, and yet I dare not, after this act of cruelty whereof he is not ignorant. 'Tis true, that if he do me justice, he wil excuse my cruelty, and Cyrus living doubtless ought to think himself obliged unto me, for what I did against Cyrus dead, since my inhumanity was as wel aneffect of my Love, as all those testimonies of tendemesse which I gave him upon a thousand occasions. Truly Madam (said Gelonide unto her) since Cyrus can never be unfaithfull unto Mandana, as long as you give him so many causes to hate you: It is not probable he should love you now, he may charge you with more hatred than love: And therefore your Majestie would do very well to re-establish your glory by some great and high action, such an Act as would regain the esteem of Cyrus. If you should now set Cyrus and Mandana free, and send them to the King of Medes, you would do an Act which would render your glory immortal. Ah Gelonide (said Thomyris and interrupted her) I know very well that I ought to love my glory above Cyrus: But I have found by long experience that I cannot, and therefore without any consideration of generosity, or reason, or virtue, I must take such a course as Cyrus may Reign in my Dominions, and in my heart: And when all hopes of that is gone, then shall my fury have no limits: and if I cannot ruine Cyrus and Mandana, unlesse I ruine Ariantes and my selfe also, I will not stick to sacrifice all unto my revenge.

But Madam (said Gelonide) I beseech you consider, that though you have Cyllrus in your power, yet you have a formidable Army to fight against: Mazares is a brave man, the Reliefe which Ciaxares sends, is puissant, and the Prince Arian|tes is not in the head of your Army. I value not my own safety (replyed Thomyris) and therefore Gelonide without any further consideration of these dangers wherewith you threaten me, which perhaps are not so great as you imagine, I will think upon nothing but to get so much boldnesse as to see Cyrus. But Madam (said Gelonide unto her) I would gladly know what you do aime at in so doing? I intend (replyed Thomyris) to do all things possible both just and unjust, which may induce Cyrus to quit Mandana; and answer my affection: and if I find there is no hopes of any good upon him, I will punish Ariantes for his old Rebellion, to the end that he may be no obstacle unto my Revenge: Then I will have Mandana stabbed before the eyes of Cyrus: I will mingle the blood of Cyllrus and Mandana together, and perhaps I will kill my self, if I finde this revenge not sweet enough. Alas Madam (cried out Gelonide) what strange thoughts are these? Alas Gelonide (replyed Thomyris) what strange thoughts may not a Queen have, who loves a man which slights her.

After this, Gelonide offered to say something, but Thomyris commanded silence, and without more delay she went unto the Tent of Cyrus, waited upon by the Lieutenant of her Guard, and some of his company which stayed at the Tent door, and kept Centinel with the rest of that Princes Guard: This Queen having no other women with her but Gelonide; for though she did not approve of her opinion, yet she loved her, and alwayes carryed her with her, because she was the only person unto whom she discovered her love. But in her way thither, Thomyris as fierce as she was her heart was strangely ashamed, yet the force of her passion overcoming all; She entred into the Tent of Cyrus, without giving him any notice, so as he was strangely surprized at this visit: Yet having a great soule, a resolute spirit, and a generous heart, there appeared no disorder in his Countenance, but he shut up all his resentments in his heart: And indeed, he no sooner saw Thomyris, but he saluted her with all reverence that was due unto the Queen of Massagettes, and it was with all the coldnesse that was due unto the Enemy of Mandana, and a Queen that had given him such a publike testimony of her hatred, as to plunge that head in a bason of blood.

As for Thomyris, she no sooner saw Cyrus, but shame at her own inhumanity made her blush, and hindred her from speaking first: So as that Prince coming towards her, is it to demand my head Madam (said he unto her with a most hello|que boldnes) that you have taken this pains to come hither? to the end that seeing it cut off with your own eyes, you may not be deceived the second time as you were at the first? When I resolved to see you Sir (replyed she, and carryed him Page 209 to the other end of the Tent) I prepared my selfe for your reproaches, that I might have some right to retort them: For unjust Prince, there is a notable difference betwixt the cruelty which I have used unto you, and that which you have used unto me. For that terrible Act which seems unto you so full of inhumanity, was only a rapture of my despair, in a beliefe that your last words were signs of love unto Mandana, and of your hatred unto me. But though I was inhumane unto you, when I thought you could not be sensible of my cruelty; yet you were inhumane and cruell unto me, when I was sensible even of the least of your slights: and though I only plunged in blood the head of Cyrus supposed dead, yet you teare my heart in pieces living, yet unjust Prince, you were the first that began the cruelty: and if I was so, it was after you had made me loose my patience, and disordered my reason. Yet though you are my prisoner, and by the right of Conquerors I may dispose of you as I please, yet I will only tell you, the sooner to induce you to quit Mandana: That unlesse I comfort my self so soon after your death as she did, she hath wronged you more than I have done by that act of cruelty, wherewith you upbraid me, and wherewith I upbraid my selfe: For truly my fury and my hatred was an effect of my passion, but her forgetfulness was an effect of a light soule, and faint feeble affection.

Therefore without asking, or beseeching you to love me, I will only beseech you not to love her any longer: That you will give your consent she should marry Ariantes whom she hates not: that I may send her unto Issedon with the Prince whom she shall marry. And that you will promise me never to see her again, upon these conditions, I will deliver you, and will not oblige you unto any acknowledgment of my affection. If you should peremptorily command me to love you, Madam, replied he, though you have given me reason to hate you; yet it would be lesse impossible for me to obey you, then it would be for me not to love Mandana, though she were perfidious unto me: For the truth is Madam, you are a great Beauty, you have a great soule, a high heart, and a thousand excellent qualities, which as great an Enemy as you are, does move me to esteem you: So that without infidelity to her whom I love and adore, I could be very friendly and esteeming of you: But Madam, I can never leave loving Mandana, nor consent she should marry Ariantes, nor promise you never to see her again.

The truth is; though I should know of a most infallible certainty that she had left off loving me, yet I could never leave off loving her, without leaving off to live, nor endure she should be enjoyed by another, without doing my utmost to prevent it, at the hazard of a thousand lives which I should never value above my glory, or my Love: And therefore Madam, never expect I should promise you more then I am able to perform: For I know, that though I should be so base as to make such a promise unto you, yet I should be no sooner at liberty, but I should Arm all Asia the second time to pull Mandana out of the arms of my Rival.

Therefore Madam, I beseech you for your own tranquillities sake, never think that I have such a kind of spirit as can submit and crouch unto any ill fortune; but on the contrary, be confident that if I were in the head of two hundred thousand men, and you my prisoner, I would do more for you, than now I am in your fetters: The truth is Madam, since I am perswaded that it is glorious not to grant that which cannot be denied without danger, I will not promise you to leave loving Mandana, or consent she should marry Ariantes, nor promise to see her no more: Since of these three things which I ask (replyed Thomyris sharply) there is one of them which depends absolutely upon me and not at all upon you, I cannot tell whether it be prudence in you to incense any by your arrogant generosity, for I need not your consent to hinder you from ever seeing Mandana; nor need it in Ariantes marriage of her, for since if I will, I can look upon you as the murderer of my Son: If the fancy take me I shall lock you up eternally in my chains. As Fortune hath brought me hither into them against my will (replyed Cyrus) so she may chance to take me out against yours: And therefore Madam without any regard unto your needless threatnings, I will tell you with all possible sincerity, that could I ever have been unfaithfull unto Mandana, your charms Madam would have made me so, when I was in your Court under the name of Artamenes. And I must ingeniously confess, that I gave her a greater testimony of my Love in not loving you, than in Page 210 the taking of Babylon, Sardis, and Cumes: Since certainly it is a more easy matter to win battells and take towns than to defend ones heart against such a person as you were when I had the honour first to see you. For to tell you truly Madam, Though you be as fair now as then you were, yet you are less terrible to me now than you were then: For truly as soon as you began to persecute Mandana, as soon as ever you began to be cruell, and would needs make your self loved by terrour, you lost all that would make you amiable. I cannot tell (said she, and in a rage interrupted him) whether I can make my self Loved, but I am sure I can make my self be obeyed. And I perceive if I will ever have any rest, I must hate you living as I did when you were dead, and seek out my satisfaction in revenge.

After this Thomyris went away and stayed not for the answer of Cyrus, and she carried with her more thoughts of fury than Love, she was vexed at the Soul, because she had not said enough, to tender his heart, she repented of every word she pronounced, and sometimes she thought that if she had gone the mild way, she had better effected her desires. And sometimes again she thought that if she had menaced him with the death of Mandana, it would have staggered his constancy: So as being unsatisfied with her self, both at what she had done, and what she should have done, she was most insufferably tormented.

On the other side, Cyrus was in a miserable condition; for not knowing that she had seen that Letter which he had writ unto Mandana, he thought that what she had spoke concerning Mandana's Levity, had a right ground, and was grieved to the very soul at it.

But whilst the souls of Cyrus and Thomyris were thus disquietted, Mereontes who was conceal'd amongst the Sauromattan Captains, with Myrsiles, Hydaspes, & Chrylsantes, they continued the same design on foot, which once was ready for Execution: The <...> ends of Ariantes also bethinking themselves how to deliver this Prince, and knowing how the Sauromates were discontented, did make a proposition to joyn with them, and get Ariantes out of the hands of Thomyris: The Sauromattan Captains without giving any positive answer unto those who made this proposition, acquainted Myrsiles, Hydaspes, Mereontes, and Chrysantes with it: Who all conceived, that if they could unite the friends of Ariantes unto theirs, that Thomyris would be infallibly lost, and that Cyrus and Mandana would be delivered: The reason why they hoped this was not impossible, was; because they knew that the friends of Ariantes were afraid Thomyris would put that Prince to death; for since he once went about to take a crown from her, they thought that she would seek for a colour to palliate her revenge upon him: So as imagining that if this union could be made, it would make much for the advantage of Cyrus, these Sauromattan Captains entertained the motion, and brought things to that pass, that the friends of Ariantes conferred with the friends of Cyrus: But since neither side could answer for those Princes for whom they transacted; they agreed that both sides should endeavour to make known the state of things unto them: And in order to that, Myrsiles, and Mereontes found out means to send word unto Cressus, and Mazares, that they should attempt nothing untill they heard further from them.

In the mean time, there passed not a day in which Thomyris had not some new persecution for Cyrus and Mandana. For she obliged all the prisoner Princes to see Cyrus one after another, and to perswade him not to pretend any more unto Mandana: Also she would have all the rest of the Captives in their turns to see Mandana and move her to marry Ariantes, and she spoke her self unto the Prince her brother, (and perswaded him not to think any more of marrying Mandana, but to give her over unto her vengeance; for this violent Queen was come to that pass that she thought no more of making Cyrus love her, but only to take his Love off her whom he adored. So that when she saw it a thing impossible to perswade Mandana ever to marry Ariantes; she had a fancy to perswade Ariantes to let her be put to death. That which I desire of you Brother (said she unto him) you should me thinks ask me, and should desire to be revenged of a strong hearted person who scorns and hates you: And though you had no other advantage by it, but to imagin the sorrows of your Rivall, yet that were enough to move your consent unto it.

Page 211 If you will suffer me (replied Ariantes rough y) to go and poyard Cyrus, I shall perhaps consent that you shall poyson Mandana: I agree unto your proposition, (answered Thomyris suddenly.) Oh most cruell Princess, (said Ariantes then) what a most abominable Love is yours? No, no (added he) deceive not your self; I am the Enemy of Cyrus, but I will never be his butcher. And moreover I do most solemnly protest, that if you attempt any thing against the life of Mandana, yours shall infallibly answer for it; for though I cannot get out of your chains, yet I have friends who will revenge you cruelly, and I doubt not but all the world will arm themselves and ruin you.

Thomyris seeing with what an Aire Ariantes spoke this, was ashamed, but it was a shame accompanied with anger, which made her express her self infinitely angry at that Prince: You think perhaps (said she unto him) to get upon that Throne which once you rebelliously mounted: But let me tell you, that I will keep you in my fetters as a vanquished Usurper, and as a rebellious Subject.

After this, that enraged Queen left him, and left him with thoughts of hatred, as great and violent against him as against Mandana, and her resolutions were as cruell against him as against her, she knew she was in the wrong; but that knowledge did not induce her to repent, but rather increased her fury. Yet in the midst of all these turbulencies she sent orders unto all the Officers of the army and endeavoured to dispose of things that she might be the commander of Cyrus and Mandana's destiny: She had a thousand desires to see that Prince again, and try if she could overcome his mind by a thousand testimonies of tenderness and affection, but the arrogant pride of her heart, and shame together, would not give her leave, but contented her self with causing him to be told that she asked no more than that he would pretend no more unto Mandana. So as by this means Cyrus saw himself delivered from the necessity of any conference with her, nor could this Queen ever tell Mandana any more that she required of her to yield Cyrus unto her, but only that she should marry Ariantes: Thus Thomyris thought to hide some part of her weakness and conserve of her modesty a little more. Yet sometimes she would express such visible testimonies of her passion. that all about her could not doubt it; for she would continually be asking what Cyrus did, and what he said? whether he did not murmur against her? whether he spoke of Mandana? and a thousand such like, And what was most strange, she would sometimes men who neither did, nor could know any thing; for none except the Guards, and such as she commanded, ever saw him. So as it was impossible for Myrsiles, Hydaspes, Mereontes, and Chrysantes, to acquaint Cyrus with the treaty which they had with the friends of Ariantes, who also on their sides could not make their intentions known unto their Prince; so that assembling one night in the Tent of one of the Sauromattan Captains, where Myrsiles, Hydaspes, Mereontes, and Chrysantes were concealed, they resolved, knowing the generosity of those two Princes, to go on with that treaty as if they consented; assuring themselves that they would not be against it.

Whilst they were assembled to that end, Meliantes escaped his guards, and came thither; much augmenting their hopes by seeing their side strengthened by such a valiant man who had intelligence of many things which Mereontes had not known but for him: Yet Hydaspes was troubled to see his Rivall the Protector of Cyrus, and Meliantes was astonished to see Hydaspes in that place: yet considering how the case of Cyrus, and all things else stood, he looked upon him in this business; as the friend of Cyrus rather than as the Lover of Alpasia; so as telling him the state of affairs, he was of their opinion and concluded that there was an absolute necessity of uniting themselves to deliver Cyrus and Ariantes. He who negotiated most for Ariantes was a Massagettan called Otryades, who had been the friend of Aripithes, and who had a great desire to see Ariantes King; so as excepting against nothing which the friends of Cyrus propounded so Ariantes might be delivered and out of the power of Thomyris, the Treaty was quickly concluded and agreed upon. They promised a mutual assistance to execute this great design; they swore they would fight jointly against those that would oppose the Liberty of Cyrus and Ariantes, and when those two Princes were free, they would address themselves unto them to know what they would have them do, every one then to have the Liberty to take which side they pleased, in case those Princes could not continue friends: Page 212 Yet there was one difficulty which Otryades durd at, for the friends of Cyrus would have the first attempt that was made upon the Tents Royal to deliver Cyrus, and the other side would have Ariantes first delivered: Then there was an expedient proposed to reconcile the matter which was to go, and fall upon the Tents Royall of Thomyris and secure her person, for (said he who made the proposition) by assuring your selves of that Queen you will deliver both Cyrus, Ariantes, and Mandana: But though there was some colour of reason in this proposition, yet the friends of Cyrus would not accept of it, because they said that if they should fall upon Thomyris at first they should hazard themselves to be overcome, since it was impossible but the people would arm themselves for the defence of their Queen, whereas on the contrary, if their design appeared to be only to deliver Cyrus, they will not stir, so as finding no resistance, the thing will be more easily executed: Adding that if once they had Cyrus in the head of them, then victory would certainly be theirs. Otryades answered unto this, that its true the Liberty of Cyrus was more easily gotten that way, but not the Liberty of Ariantes, since it depended after that upon the will of his Rivall. So as finding out a middle way between these two extremes, Myrsiles proposed to make two assaults at once, so as to amuse Thomyris the more, who would be forced to divide her Forces. So then it was resolved that this expedient propounded by Myrsiles should be followed, and that the Tents where Cyrus and Ariantes were guarded should be set upon both at once: That they should not go unto that of Mandana, because they would leave the glory of delivering her unto the two Princes: That in the mean time they should promise each other, that they who did first execute their design, and had effected it, they should go immediately and assist the other to execute theirs, and that they should oblige the Prince whom they had delivered to go and help to deliver his Rivall. These things being thus resolved upon, they waited for the day, and hour of Execution. They sent away immediately unto Cressus and Mazares, to the end they might fall upon the Camp of Thomyris; when the Sauromates came to the Tents Royall to joyn with the friends of Cyrus and Ariantes, and to the end they might send unto Artabatis to fall upon Andramites with part of his forces, and send the rest to entrench themselves between the Tents Royall and the Camp of Thomyris: Thus it was resolved that after four daies, and just at midnight after, this great design should be executed: But at the end of this conference, Mereontes knowing upon what termes both Meliantes and Hydaspes were, he came unto them, and very discreetly obliged them to refer all their difference untill Cyrus was delivered, so as both of them being perswaded unto it with equall generosity, they unanimously transacted together for the interest of this great Prince as if they had never been Rivalls. Thus Meliantes looked upon Hydaspes as the friend of Cyrus, and Hydaspes looked upon Meliantes as the Protector of this Hero. In the Interim, those, for whom this great design was in transaction, were not a jot the less miserable, but saw so little likelihood of any alteration in their fortunes, that they did not only suffer under their present afflictions, but also under the fears of those which would infallibly fall upon them in the future: Yet Thomyris was in a worse condition then they, because her hopes were less then theirs; And all the sweetness that she had in life, was only in the long torments which she was preparing for those who rendered her so unhappy. But her principall drift was, to put off that Winter without fighting, to the end that the Army of Cyrus might be forced to retreat on the other side of Axes, it not being possible it should subsist in an Enemies Country, by continually supplies so far fetched.

As Thomyris was in this mind, and in order unto that, sending order upon order not to hazard a fight, at least, unless upon some great advantage, there chanced an accident, which much augmented her inquietudes: so as it is a hard matter that a great secret known unto many men should be long undiscovered, especially when it is amongst persons of severall sides; so there was one of Ariantes his friends, kinsman unto Otryades, who seeing this great design ripe, and that it would be executed the next day at midnight, he began to repent; for since he knew not how far the generosity of Cyrus might extend, he imagined that when this Prince was delivered, he would load Thomyris with the same Chains wherein he had been fettered: that he would ruine Ariantes; that he would make all Page 213 the Massagettans Tributaries, or else in revenge would quite extirpate them. So as wondering that he should have these thoughts no sooner, he repented of his engagement with Otryades, and his repentance went so far, that he intended to betray all those unto whom he had promised fidelity. Tis true, he thought that by acquainting Thomyris, he should oblige her to deliver Ariantes: So, without more delay he went unto the Queen secretly in the night, and desired private conference: At the first, he desired of her a promise of Ariantes his liberty, in case he acquainted her with such things, as should let her see he had done her the best service that ever any did. But since that Queen would not engage her selfe unto any such promise, he then told her that he would impart no further unto her: Thomyris being incensed at him, said, that it was not his duty to capitulate with her, but bad him know that he was in her Tent, that she was Mistress, both of his liberty and life, and therefore she would make him tell all he knew, without any conditions.

This man being terrified by the fury of Thomyris, he told her all he knew concerning the design which was to be executed the night following; also he did so punctually circumstance the business, that she did not doubt of any thing he said, so as she was infinitely amazed and perplexed; and to confirm her belief, Agathirses sent to acquaint her, That part of Artabates his Troops draw near them, and that he could not dive into the design of it: That he understood also by some Prisoners which he had taken, that there was some great enterprise preparing in the Camp of Cyrus, and that he thought himself obliged to tell her how he understood that there was a Confederacy amongst some Officers in her Army. Thomyris finding a Concurrence with what the Kinsman of Otryades had told her, her Soul was so perplexed, that she knew not what to resolve upon.

At the first she intended to arrest Myrsiles, Meliantes, Hydaspes, Mereontes, and Chrysantes, in the Tent where this Kinsman unto Otryades said they were: But upon second thoughts she considered, that though they were arrested, yet they were but five men; that this would not hinder the Sauromates from severing from her Army, and from coming to the Tents Royall; nor would it hinder Cressus and Mazares from falling upon her Camp, nor Artabatis from assaulting Andramites, nor the rest of his Forces from encamping between the Tents Royall and her Camp; And that so she should only make a great noise to no purpose, and perhaps hasten the Execution of that design which would ruine her: So as not knowing neither what to do, nor what to think, she was almost out of her wits; But since her greatest care was to hinder Cyrus and Mandana from ever being happy together, her design was to make sure of them, and that their lives might be in her power, in case she was forced to fly: And in order to that, she commanded that Mandana should be immediately removed out of that Tent where she was unto another, near that where Cyrus was kept; to the end, that if her Party proved the weaker, she might put them to death before she fled. For she conceived that if the design of her Enemies did take, she could not be in a condition to carry them unto Issidon, as her intention was to retire her self if she was forced. Also she gave orders that double Guards should be set upon Ariantes? She commanded the Tent wherein Myrsiles, Meliantes, Hydaspes, Mereontes, and Chrysantes were concealed to be set round in the evening; She commanded all the Cavalry she had to be ready upon a minutes warning: And she acquainted all the Officers of her Army with what the kinsman of Otryades had told her; also she ordered all the Souldiers to be ready in Armes, and she her self made choise of him whom she intended for the Murderer of Cyrus and Mandana and accordingly she sent for that Geon Captain, who presented her the head of Spitridates in lieu of the head of Cyrus, and propounded this cruell act unto him, for knowing him to be a man that was void of all humanity, and so corrupt, she believed he would obey her in any thing; and indeed she was not deceived in him, for this barbarous Geon promised her to poyniard Cyrus and Mandana, whensoever she gave the word: And to that end she gave him absolute command over all those who guarded them, and permitted him also to have many of his own Souldiers with him, in whom he trusted more, then in the former Guards of those two Illustrious Persons, who plainly perceived by this change, that some bad intentions Page 214 were towards. This Gelon Captain being naturally harsh and cruell, he treated them in a manner much different then they were before: For Mandana durst not so much as whisper unto Doralisa, or Martesia, or Hisionide, who now waited upon her, and Cyrus had not so much liberty as to speak unto any of the Guard.

But whilst Thomyris was dispersing her severall Commanders, the night came on, and all those who laboured for the liberty of Cyrus, Ariantes, and Mandana prepared themselves for the execution of the design; Myrsiles, Meliantes, Hydaspes, Mereontes, and Chrysantes, were much surprised when they heard that Mandana's Tent was changed, and that there were some men in Armes who beſet the Tent wherein they were. Otryades alſo wondered that he did not ſee his kinsman, and the more when he heard that he was ſeen to go into the Tent of Thoſmyris, and being a man of much honeſty, he ſent ſecretly to advertise Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hydaspes, Mereontes, and Chriſantes of his fears: So as they began to conſult what they ſhould do to get into ſome place where they might ſafely wait untill they heard that the Sauromates, who were to quit the Camp of Thomyris, were come and had made an aſſault upon thoſe who guarded the Tents Royall, and conceiving there was no ſafe ſtaying in that Tent wherein they were, they got the Habits of ſlaves upon their own, and as ſoon as ever it began to be dark, they went out at ſeveral dores unto another Tent where Chryſantes carried them, and where he and Feraulas lay id when they diſguiſed them like Maſſagettans, and came to enquire of their Illuſtrious Maſter: Otryades alſo, ſhifted his Tent, and aſſembled ſo many of his friends about him, as it had not been an eaſy matter to take him, thought it had been attempted.

In the mean time, Thomyris was in a ſtrange perplexity as ſoon as the night came; for conſidering the intelligence which ſhe had received, ſhe had a deſire to be in the head of her Army: but not being able to be far from Cyrus and Mandana, ſince ſhe would be ſure to diſpoſe of their lives, therefore ſhe would ſtay in the Tents Royall: and in the miſt of all her violent thoughts, ſhe found ſome ſweetneſs in thinking, that though all her Army were defeated, though the Tents Royall were forced, and though ſhe were forced to fly, yet ſhe could prevent Cyrus and Mandana from being delivered, ſince it was in her power to put them to death as ſoon as ſhe ſaw no other hopes. To that end, ſhe would not go to bed that night, but be in readineſs to give orders as ſhe ſaw occaſion, and to fly if forced. But at laſt the fatal time of diſturbſing the ſerenity of that quiet night being come, every one from ſeverall Quarters began to act their buſineſs at ſuch a juſt hour, that almoſt at the very ſame inſtant Artabatis fell upon Artamites at the entrance of the Wood; Creſſus and Mazares aſſaulted the Camp of Thomyris, The Sauromates came to the Tents Royall, half of Artabatis his Forces got between the Camp and the Tents Royall, and the friends of Cyrus and Ariantes met in the place appointed: And indeed as ſoon as the Sauromates began the Aſſault, the friends of Cyrus and Ariantes divided themſelves; one went to the Tent of Cyrus, the other to that of Ariantes, each of theſe courageous Troops conſiſting of about a hundred ſtout Souldiers, which they had ſecretly made ſure of: So as Thomyris hearing by ſeverall waies at one time that her Camp was aſſaulted; That Forces had got betwixt and cut off all Communication, that others would fall upon the Tents Royall, and that ſome alſo would aſſault the Tents of Cyrus and Ariantes, ſhe was more perplexed then is imaginable. In this great diſorder, ſhe commanded that they ſhould defend that Tent wherein Cyrus was as her own, and indeed that wherein the Prince was, and that wherein Mandana was, were ſo cloſe to hers, that they all made but one

In the mean time, according to the Maſſagettan cuſtom in popular tumults, or in ſurprizalls of War, every one began to ſet a light upon the Tops of their Tents, to the end they might diſtinguiſh between friends and Enemies: So as hard by this huge multitude of Tents having every one a Lamp like a guilded apple wherewith the Maſſagetts uſe to adorn the tops of their Tents, they made ſuch a pleaſant ſhew and gave ſuch a light as one might eaſily know friends from foes. The Tent of Thomyris ſtanding in the miſt, and the higheſt, ſhe might diſcern from thence the noiſe which the Sauromates made in aſſaulting the Tents Royall. The noiſe which Otryades made in aſſaulting the Tent of Ariantes; that which Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hydaspes, Mereontes, Chryſantes and their company made in forcing thoſe who guarded a bar which was before the firſt dore of the Tent where Cyrus was, which Tent was ſo contrived, that they muſt paſs through three Tents before they came into that wherein he was, and by conſequence they had three Courts of guard to force.

Thomyris hearing ſuch a tumultuous hurly burly from all parts, did prepare her ſelf for flight, and indeed there were horſes ready behinde the Tent, and thoſe who were to wait upon her were ready alſo; and ſhe called for a ponyard, to the end ſhe might be miſtreſs of her own life as well as of the lives of Cyrus and Mandana, and never become a Captive to her Enemies.

Every minute ſome came to acquaint her with the ſtate of things, and every minute ſhe received a freſh affliction: Creſſus and Mazares having fallen upon the Camp of Thomyris at the ſame time when the Sauromates fell upon the Tents Royall, they had put them to ſuch great diſorder, that all the valour of Agatherſis and of all the reſt of the high Officers, could not keep their men from ſinking under their own fears: So as thinking it fit to acquaint Thomyris with the ſtate of things, Agatherſis was ſo plain with her, as ſhe knew that ſince ſuch a valiant man as he deſpaired of victory, ſhe might well fear the worſt.

On the other ſide, the Sauromates who aſſaulted the Tents Royall fighting as well to revenge their dead Prince as to deliver Cyrus, their animosity was ſo great that their valour was terrible, ſo as Thomyris ſaw all went wrong with her: But her greateſt grief was, thoſe who would force the Tent where Cyrus was were maſters of the firſt barr, and were fighting for the firſt Entrance into the Tent. Her greateſt aſtoniſhment was, that the people would not ſtir againſt the Sauromates, nor offer to relieve her: For ſince they thought the impriſonment of Cyrus to be unjuſt, they wiſhed that he, and Mandana both were at liberty, in a thought that then the war would ſoon be at an end.

Thomyris ſeeing her ſelf in this extremity, had but the choice of theſe two waies before her flight, either to leave Cyrus and Mandana happy in their liberty, or elſe to put them to death. A thought of Juſtice, Generoſity, and Love gave ſome repugnancy unto ſuch a tragically reſolution, but on the other ſide, Love being accompanied with Jealouſy, Deſpair, and Fury, ſhe thought that ſince there was no hopes of enjoying the party loved, there was no way but revenge: Yet ſhe ſtood and ſtudied a while; as unreſolved, and would tarry till the very laſt extreameſty, before ſhe did execute her cruel Reſolution. She intended to ponyard Mandana before ſhe killed Cyrus, and ſhe intended, during this great tumult, to try once more if ſhe could tender the heart of that Prince: But as ſhe entered into his Tent, ſhe heard him name her, ſo as ſtaying to hear what he ſaid, ſhe changed her mind: For Cyrus being in a ſtrange inquietude to know the cauſe of ſo great a noiſe which he heard, he aſked that cruel Captain of the Gelons whether Thomyris had deſigned him for his butcher, and he answering him as arrogantly as if he were to ponyard him preſently, Cyrus could not hold from ſpeaking ſharply unto him, I plainly ſee (ſaid he unto him) that you are fit to be the murdering miniſter of that cruel Queens Injuſtice, and who had never been in a condition to perſecute Mandana, if I had killed her as I eaſily could in the wood of Sacromates. That thou mayſt not upbraid me for letting thee live, (cried out the fierce Thomyris) as thou doſt upbraid thy ſelf in ſparing my life, I will cauſe thee to be ſtabbed as ſoon as Mandana has given up her laſt breath; and all the favour that thou canſt expect is to dy by the ſame hand that ſhe did, and that the dagger which pierced her heart ſhall pierce thine alſo.

After this, ſhe called for the Captain of the Gelons, and went to her Tent leaving Cyrus more grieved at her menaces againſt Mandana then ever he was before, as for his own life he did not value it; nor could he answer unto what that unjuſt Queen ſaid: for he did ſo wonder to hear her voice, and to hear that ſad ſentence againſt Mandana, that before he could recover himſelf out of his aſtoniſhment, and be ſure that he underſtood how ſhe was gone; yet he could not chooſe but ſpeak out of the abundance of his grief as if ſhe were preſent, and vented ſuch moving expreſſions, as if the Guards had underſtood him, doubtleſs their hearts had been mollified; but ſince they did not underſtand that language wherein he expreſſed himſelf, they were not at all moved; For being almoſt all Gelons, they underſtood not the Persian, Armenian, Grecian, Cappadocean, nor the Medean Language, ſo as all the complaints of Cyrus before them, were but wind.

However, the tumult ſtill increaſing, Thomyris underſtood that the Sauromates had forced thoſe who reſiſted them. So as foreſeeing that Cyrus and Mandana would infallibly be relieved, if ſhe did not put them to death, and that ſhe her ſelf would be taken if ſhe did not fly; ſhe commanded that barbarous Captain of the Gelons whom ſhe had brought into her Tent, to go and ponyard Mandana and afterwards Cyrus; appointing him to let the death of that Princeſs be firſt known unto him: This horrid Officer began to prepare himſelf for obedience, and he had not gone two paces but ſhe called him back, and told him in a ſhaking voice, that ſhe would have him kill Mandana, and not Cyrus: but one of the Guards coming in and acquainting her that the Tent wherein he was would be quickly forced, ſhe called for the fatal Executioner again: Go (ſaid ſhe) and execute my firſt commands, and be ſure you firſt acquaint Cyrus with the death of Mandana, for I ſhall not be revenged enough, unleſs he do alſo know of her death, as ſoon as you have done, return back unto me and bring me word of the end of their lives, who have ſo troubled the tranquility of mine, to the end I may ſee whether I muſt dy, or fly. The inhumane Thomyris having given this moſt horrid command, he who was to execute it, went into Mandana's Tent; as ſoon as he was entered all the women were heard to cry out moſt lamentably, and preſently after, this bloody man came out with a dagger all bloody in his hand, and entering in that Equipage into the Tent of Cyrus; he went ſtraight towards that illuſtrious Prince, with intentions to ſtrike him to the heart, and thought that his companions would help him in the aſſaſſination, if his firſt blow miſſed, but ſince he would exactly obey the Commands of Thomyris he told him in broken Aſſyrian, that his dagger ſtill wrecked with the blood of Mandana, and as ſoon as he had ſaid ſo, he lifted up his Arm to ſtabb the greateſt Prince upon Earth, but as he thought to have ſtruck him to the heart, Cyrus having heard of Mandana's death, and deſiring revenge, he did enervate his valiant ſtrength and ſnatched it out of his hand, and without more delay ſtruck him to the heart, and made him fall at his feet. This heroicque action was done ſo ſuddenly, and deſpair had made the viſage of Cyrus ſo terrible, that his guards were all affrighted and knew not what to do.

But at laſt one of them falling upon him, and by his Example, ſhewing others what to do, Cyrus was in greater danger then ever, but fighting now in revenge of Mandana, more then in defence of his own life, his valour appeared more then ever.

He got a ſword from one of the Guards, as before he got a Dagger from the Gellon Captain, and did things ſo prodigious, as to relate them in particular, would ſeem incredible: For he did not only kill three or four of the Guard, wounded many, & made the reſt to fly, but he came boldly out of his Tent, & went to that of Thoſmyris, to ſeek for ſome more noble victory to ſacrifice unto Mandana, then thoſe he had in his Tent: So as all making way for ſuch a terrible enemy, he went juſt unto the doore of that Queens Tent, who expected the return of him whom, ſhe had commanded to kill both Mandana and Cyrus.

Her wonder was not a little, in Lieu of him, ſhe ſaw Cyrus himſelf holding a Dagger in one hand, and a Sword in the other, and who by a menacing action made thoſe who guarded the Tent to let him enter.

Thomyris ſeeing his Action did think he came with intention to kill her, ſo as talking the Dagger which ſhe had: No, no Cyrus (ſaid ſhe, and ſhewed it unto him) thou ſhalt not be maſter of my deſtiny, ſince I have not been Miſtreſs of thine, and if thou comeſt a foot further, I will let thee ſee, in ſlighting Death, that I was not worthy of thy ſcorn.

Thomyris pronounced theſe words with ſuch a reſolute voice, that the Grandure of her courage, equalling that of her cruelty, did a while ſuſpend the intentions of thoſe who heard her, for Cyrus did not advance, the Guards of the Queen did not fall upon that Prince, and for a while all was ſilent, as if amazed.

But at laſt, the great Soule of Cyrus not permitting him to have any hand in the blood of a Queen as cruel as ſhe was: Since I cannot kill thee (ſaid he unto Thomyris) without polluting that hand which ought to revenge Mandana, ſacrifice thy ſelfe unjuſt Queen unto her, whoſe death thou gav'ſt, whiſt I go and beſtow it upon my Rivall. At theſe words Cyrus making his way through all that would ſtop his paſſage (for hee knew not that Ariantes was priſoner) he heard the ſame Queen who before commanded him to be killed, now forbid thoſe who aſſaulted him, and ſhe came in perſon to forbid them.

As things were thus, another great noiſe was heard which made Cyrus believe, that now he ſhould ſhortly go unto Mandana, and dye before he had revenged hers by the death of his Rivall. But he was ſtrangely ſurprized to ſee that they who made that great noiſe were Myrſiles, Meliantes, Hydaspes, Mereontes, Chriſantes, and thoſe who followed them; who after they had cleared their way, and forced unto the Tents of Cyrus, which they found empty, went afterwards unto Mandana's, where they found the unfortunate Heſionide dead, whom the Gelon Captain had killed in lieu of Mandana; for ſhe being of the ſame ſtature, ſhe had put on Mandana's cloaths, and Mandana hers, in hopes to eſcape during that great hurly burly which they heard: So as Myrſiles and the reſt having no mind to leave Mandana in that Tent, did bring her along with them with Doralis and Martesia, when they found Cyrus at the entrance into the Tent of Thomyris. This great Prince ſeeing his Princeſſe amongſt his friends, was ſo tranſported with joy, that hee never thought upon the ruine of that cruel Queen, who would have ruin'd her ſelfe.

But on the contrary, his first rapture of joy being over, he perceived that Tho|myris did lift up her arme to kill her selfe, he cried out unto those who stood nea|rest to prevent her: For seeing Mandana was not dead, though she had given or|ders for it, yet did he most generously pardon her.

But during this tumultuous minute when friends & enemies were so mingled together without fighting, another great and strange noise was heard: so as Cyrus thinking now upon nothing but how to preserve Mandana; he never thought upon Thomyris; who being hindered by her own men from killing her selfe, did take that opportunity to go out of her Tent by a back door: so as taking Horse, shee with those who were to convoy her, forsook the Tents Royall, and did abandon her selfe un|o more horrid sorrow than ever soule was sensible of.

But whilst she was flying away, it hapned that those who made the great noise were the Prince Intaphernes, Atergatis, & Feraulas, whose Guards being affrigh|ted at this great disorder, had left them: So as being got out, they went to the Tent of the Sauromates, who were to fight for Cyrus, and afterwards unto the Tent of Thomyris where they found them: But when the first apprehensions of joy were passed, Chrysantes not seeing Thomyris in her Tent, asked Cyrus whe|ther he would not follow her, and bring her captive back? But this generous Prince understanding from Myrsiles and Mereontes, the conditions of the Treaty which they held with the friends of his Rivall, he told Chrysantes that it was better to keep promise with his friends in delivering Ariantes, than to pursue an unfortunate Queen, whom, questionlesse the Gods would punish, with|out his meddling with her. And indeed, Cyrus, after he had taken all requisite order for the safety of Mandana, he went himselfe to help the friends of Arian|tes and his own in the delivery of that Prince, but there was no need: For in going thither, he met with Otryades, who told Mereontes, that Ariantes was dead. How (replied Cyrus) is Ariantes killed? Yes (replied Otryades) and killed by an ancient Rivall of his, yet the truth is, that unfortunate Prince did urge him unto it: But I pray (said Cyrus) let us understand in few words how Agathyrises came to kill Ariantes? Sir (replied Otryades) when your Army had entirely defeated that of Thomyris, maugre all the valour of the Massagettans, Agathyrses thought it his best course to come with that small remnant of his Cavalry, and joyn himself with Thomyris. But Sir, in his way thither, all those who fol|lowed him, forsook him, except only five or sixe. However, his great heart would needs go through unto that Queen: but in this way he was to passe before the Tent of Ariantes, and came just thither, as we had delivered that Prince, unto Page 218 whom we had given Armes, to the end he might come according to our promise to your friends, and help them to deliver you. So as Ariantes seeing Agathyr|ses (whom he had never seen since their last difference) and his mind being exas|perated by his ill fortune, he spoke something unto him in an arrogant way, as if he had upbraided him with all the misfortunes of his life. Agathyrses having a high and sensible soule, answered him in the like: Upon which Ariantes without any reply drew his Sword, and fell upon him so suriously, that Agathyrses who out of his respect was alighted from his Horse, was forced to defend himselfe: And indeed so he did, in such a manner, that before we could part them, Arian|tes was mortally wounded, and Agathyrses in the throng escaped: So since Arian|tes was the first who assaulted, honour would not permit us to follow him: However, as soon as Ariantes was fallen, I thought hee should dye: therefore beginning to speak, and looking upon me, 'Tis past Otryades (said he unto me) and I have no more share in life, only so much as to entreat you to tell Mandana that none ever gave her a greater testimony of love, than my selfe in being un|gratefull unto Cyrus.

After this, Ariantes growing weak, upon a sudden he expired: so as having layd his Corps in the next Tent under the guard of some friends, I came with the rest, to keep my promise unto the Prince Myrsile, Meliantes, Hidaspes, Merion|tes and Chrysantes. Otryades having done speaking, Cyrus according to his cu|stome behaved himselfe with all imaginable generosity; for he spoke very worthily of the valour of Ariantes, and seemed to lament his death very much, since he had taken from him the glory of using him kindly.

After which, this great Prince received news that Cressus & Mazares were adv|ancing toward the Tents Royal, & were joyned with those Forces which quarte|lder between the Tents, and the Camp of Thomyris: That Artabatis had defeated Andramites, who dyed at that bout: and that at the same time he had re-taken the Fort of Sauromates, and consequently delivered the King of Hircania and Alnacharsis. So as seeing no more Enemies to fight against, he had nothing to do but to appease the great tumult which was in the Tents Royall, and to prevent plunder. Thus causing Proclamation to be made, that Thomyris was fled, that Ariantes was dead, and that hee would pardon all the Massagettans, so they would lay down their Arms: In one hour all was quiet, all the Massagettans layd down their Arms, and kept within their Tents: The Sauromates left plundering, and went under their Ensigns unto all the advenues of the Tents Royall, unto the publique places, & before the Tent where Mandana was: After which, Cyrus per|mitted Intephernes, Atergatis, Meliantes, and Hidaspes to go unto the Princesse Onesile, the Princesse of Bythinia, Istrina, Arpasia, and Telagenes, to bring them unto Mandana: Yet he would not have given this permission unto Meliantes and Hidaspes to see Arpasia, but upon condition they should carry themselves in this businesse as friends, and not aa the lovers of Arpasia. And indeed they obeyed Cyrus, who after he had given all requisite orders for all things, he went un|to Mandana, unto whom all the captive Princesses were come: And she received him with so many signes of joy in her countenance, that he thought himselfe rich|ly recompenced for all the miseries he had endured since first he began to love her.

And to render his happiness more compleat, Feraulas gave him to understand in few words, how much too blame he was in suspecting the fidelity of Mandana, and upbraiding her with those joyes which she seemed to have after hee had ac|quainted her with his being alive: so that his soule being fully satisfied, and his mind in perfect tranquility, he accosted her with unexpressable delight: Oh Ma|dam (said he unto her after he had saluted her, and done all his befitting comple|ments unto the rest of the Princesses with her) I begin now to hope that Fortune has done her worst, and that the Gods will render justice unto your merit and virtue, since Cressus and Mazares have vanquished our Enemies, since Artabatis hath done the like, and since the Fort of the Sauromates is taken.

My greatest hope is (replied Mandana most obligingly, unto whom Feraulas had spoken enough to justifie Cyrus for upbraiding her) that you do so well de|serve to be happy, as I need not fear being unfortunate, since you have perswaded Page 219 me that you will never think your selfe so if I be miserable: But for all that Sir, I have seen such great and sudden alterations in my Fortune, that sometimes my feares are above my hopes; Yet when I consider how the King of Assyria, the King of Pontus, and the Prince Ariantes are all dead: That Thomyris is fled: that I am in the same place where I was a Captive: that you are absolute Master of the Tents Royall, that your Armies are victorious, that the Fort of Sauromates is taken, that the passage over the River Araxes is free, and that the Prince Ma|zares is more vertuous then amorous, me thinks I am much too blame if I fear a|ny thing, but have all the reason in the world to hope that the end of my life will be much more happy than the beginning was. Doubtlesse Madam you have reason to think so (replied Cyrus) But for me, whose destiny is in your hands more than in Fortunes, I have still more reason to feare, than hope.

As long as you believe me to be just (answered Mandana most obligingly) doubtlesse you have more reason to hope than to feare: and therefore since I be|lieve you will do me justice, I do not think it necessary to give you any new tel|stimonies of my acknowledgments: Alas Madam (said he) how ill does the word acknowledgment sute with my expectations? my supream hopes is in the honour of your affection; and I look upon it as a thing so precious, that though I had done you millions of services more then I have, yet I should think my selfe infi|nitely ungratefull, if I did not desire to do you much more, and to employ every minute of my life in doing you new services, and giving you fresh testimo|nies of my affection.

After this, the night being so far spent, that day was ready to break, Cyrus thought it fit to leave the Ladies to their rest: And therefore left them in the Tent of Thomyris, whilst hee went into another, with all the Princes who had been sharers with him in his miseries, and now were to be partakers of his happi|nesse. However, since Mandana in the midst of her joyes was still grieved for the death of Hesionide, she appointed all honours should be rendred unto her Fu|nerall, and Feraulas had it in charge to have an especial care of it. On the o|ther side, Cyrus whose eye was upon every thing, he took singular care, that all the women of Thomyris who did not follow her, should receive no wrong: As for Gelonide, though she did not approve of that Queens passion, yet she follow|ed her as a comforter in her miserie.

In the mean time, since it was impossible to think upon any sleep that night, and since Cyrus was accustomed to wake without any prejudice to himselfe, he em|ployed that little time between his leaving Mandana and the break of day, in thinking of departure the next day from a place where his Princesse and he had endured such miseries: For since the Battle which Cressus and Mazares fought was not deep in blood, because the Sauromates dissenting the Massagets, the Ar|my of Thomyris was put into disorder, he thought it not impossible, and much lesse when he heard that his Army was encamped within twelve furlongs of the Tents Royall; and that Cressus and Mazares sent to him to know what his plea|sure was: so as seeing no obstacle unto his design, since his Troops were reassem|bled, and encamped so neer; as soon as he thought that the Ladies had sufficiently rested themselves, and quitted all their feares, he sent to aske Mandana whether shee had rather be in the Camp or in the Tents Royall? And her thoughts being his, he began to give out his last Orders. But first, the piety of Mandana moved her to begin her journey with a sacrifice of Thanks unto the Gods: So though the Massagets had no Temples, yet she offered a sacrifice of Thanks by an Ecbatane Priest, who was come into the Army of Cyrus, and who came into the Tents Royall also, to see whether it was true that the Daughter of his King was at liberty.

After this, Cyrus told Otryades that it was fit that all Funerall honours should be done unto the Prince Ariantes, and he left him wherewith to build a stately Sepulchre and Monument for the Prince Spiritrides and Araminta: and he com|manded that one also should be erected next theirs for the faithful Hesionide. Afterwards he sent some to follow Thomyris, and to tell her from him that though all the Countrey of the Massagettes might be his, as the rest of his Conquest, were, yet he would not pursue her, but generously restore it unto her; declaring that he had never made War but for the liberty of Mandana, he would look no Page 220 further, but would turn back over Araxes, without taking away any thing that was hers, only some Coaches, which he could not get else-where, in which all the Prin|cesses & Ladies did get, and Cyrus riding on Hors-back, accompanied with Myrsiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, Meliantes, Hydaspes, Mereontes, Chrisantes, Feraulas, and some other Sauromattan Captains which took his part were their Convoy, and carried them to the Camp, causing all his Troops to quit the Tents Royall, and march in Battalia behind Mandana. And whilst she was advancing towards the Camp of Cyrus, Cressus and Mazares prepared themselves to receive her with all the honors which so short a warning would permit. To that end they drew out all their Troops in their Arms, and making a Guard of sixe furlongs in length, they went to meet them, accompanied with the Prince Tygranes, Artamas, Gada|ltes, Indathyrses, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Gabrias, Silamis, Araspes, Aglatidas, Liq|aamis, Adonacris, Mnesiphiles, Cherseas, Diocles, and many others.

The truth is, Mazares was not without new agitation of soule: For in the time when he thought Cyrus dead, hope had a little revived in his heart, and there kindled new flames, so as there was a new Combat between his virtue and his love: yet in the end virtue got the predominancy, and he had such a power over himselfe, that nothing appeared in his countenance but a quiet joy, when he saw Cyrus and Mandana together, and saw them in such a condition, as in all proba|bility they might hope for happiness together, and he received them both with many signs of esteem and amity: For after Cressus had saluted them, they gave a thousand commendations unto Mazares, and afterwards unto all the men that accompanied them. Gadates, he was very glad to see Istrina again, Gabrias was joyed at the sight of Arpasia, and he could not choose but be glad also to see Mel|liantes, though he knew not well how to carry himself between him and Hidaspes. Indathyrses was much satisfied at the sight of Telagenes, unto whom he had a strong inclination: Tigranes was as much rejoiced to see Onesile, as if he were her Lover, and not her Husband. Intaphernes spoke unto the Princess of Bythinia, who was more sad than any of the rest, because she mourned for the death of her Father and Spiritridates. Myrsiles he entertained Doralisa, who according to her humour complained against him for not comforting her after the death of Andramites, of which she was very glad. As for Meliantes and Hidaspes, they both spoke unto Arpasia and Gabrias, keeping most exactly within the limits which Cyrus had prescribed them: So the way not being very fit for long discourse, the entertain|ment of these excellent persons quickly ended, and continuing their march, they were received into the Camp with such acclamations of great joy as never was the like heard.

In the mean time, as impatient as Cyrus was to be far off the place where his Princesse and himselfe had been Captives, yet there was a necessity of lying in the Camp; for before all the Officers of the Army had expressed all their Joyes and Complements, it was so late as there was no thinking of departure: So as Ma|ndana and the other Princesses lodged in the Tents of Cressus and Mazares, Cyrus in that of Artamas, Cressus and Mazares in those of Gabrias and Gadates, and all the rest of the Princes in their own. Cyrus was no sooner dis-engaged from that abundance of men who testified their joyes, but he went unto the Tent of the Princesses, where he passed away the Evening in such great delight, that he quite forgot all his past miseries; for since there was not one Lady there who had not some particular friend to entertain, except Onesile, who entertained Mazares, Cyrus applied himself wholly unto Mandana; and in such a most agreeable manner, that in lieu of accusing, he was forced to justify her: For though Feraulas had told him that he was obliged unto her for that smile which he saw in her eyes as she passed before his Tent, yet he was extremely glad to hear from the mouth of his Princess, that she grieved for him, and was not comforted after she heard of his death: And she did so obligingly aggravate her griefe that day she beheld the dismall ceremony of Thomyris, that his joyes were unconceivable. And when he looked upon the faire eyes of Mandana, and considered that they shed teares for him, all the love of his heart appeared in his ovne: and he thanked her for it in such a passionate manner, that Mandana thought him worthy of those tears which she shed, and that he did merit her affection: So as laying aside that exact and Page 221 severe reservednesse, which alwayes obliged her to hide the tendernes of her thoughts, shee did him the favour that night to discover part of her mind unto him, and to let him divine the rest.

But whilst these two illustrious Lovers were making mutuall exchanges of love, Intaphernes did what he could to comfort his Princess in her mourning: Atergatis also entertained Istrina with abundance of satisfaction; for since the King of Assyria was dead, he believed Gadates would be no hinderance of his happinesse. As for Myrsiles, though he was very much joyed in his talk with Doralisa, yet he was lesse happy then the rest; because her humour was such, that though she had loved that Prince as well as he loved her, yet he would find such a sweet inequality in her, as he would often complain of her rigour, even when she intended to give him cause to commend her: For though she was always equally generous towards her friends, yet she was alwayes very unequall towards her Lovers: So as though Myrsiles was much joyed in being with her, yet it was with a mixture of many bitter minutes.

But as for Meliantes and Hydaspes, they were the least content of all; for such was the temper of Arpasia's mind, that endeavouring to carry faire unto both, she obliged neither. Yet Meliantes was happier than Hydaspes, because Hidaspes thought Meliantes more in Arapasias favour than he was; so as though Meliantes was not altogether content with his Mistress, yet he was very glad to see the sadnesse of his Rivall, though he extremely grieved that he enjoyed but halfe that heart of her he loved. But as for Hydaspes, since he hoped to have enjoyed all; and seeing it divided into two, his sorrows were above his expressions; for in point of glory, he concealed his vexation from his Rivall. Meliantes also on his side, out of the same motive he made it appear that he was more joyed than he was; and to get him some advantage over Hydaspes, it chanced when the discourse was generall: and when Cyrus was ready to retire, that he spoke very advantageously of Meliantes unto Mandana, and entreated her very obligingly to let him have the honour of her esteeme and friendship: Also Meliantes thought himselfe highly recompenced for the service he had done that Prince, since he had given him such commendations: For truly Madam (said Cyrus unto Mandana) I assure you that Meliantes hath more conquered me by his virtue, than his valour, though his valour be such as made me his prisoner: and such is his merit, that doubtlesse he deserves your acquaintance.

Oh Sir! (said Meliantes) I cannot endure you should say you were my Prisoner; for I have ever endeavoured to obey you since the first time I had the honour to see you: 'Tis true (replied Cyrus) but however, by the laws of War, you might have commanded me, and in not doing it, your generosity the more appears. Also I assure you, that you have lost nothing by it; for my acknowledgment gives you more power over me, than the right of Conquerors can over the conquered.

After this, Cyrus making himself ready to go away, Meliantes could not reply, and all the company parted. But Mandana did not yet go to bed; for since Cyrus had told her that he would send away Posts unto Ecbatane and Persepolis in the morning, that Princesse would write unto Ciaxares; she writ also unto the Queen of Persia: And accordingly, Cyrus by break of day dispatched Araspes towards Cambyses, and Aglatidas towards Ciaxares, making choise of the last of these to carry this great news unto the King of Medes, to the end he might see his deare Amestris. However, to loose no precious time, as soon as all the Princesses were ready, they departed, and all the Army marched: For though there was no Enemy appeared in a body, yet Cyrus would have his Army march in Battalia, untill he was on the other side of Araxes. And when he came unto the entrance into the wood which had been burned, Artabatis came and met Cyrus, who received him as a man who had much contributed unto his liberty, by the victory he had gotten over Andramites, and by those Troops which he sent unto the Tents Royall. It was in that place also where the wise Anacharsis did meet Cyrus, and did infinitely commend the moderation which he shewed towards Thomyris: But Cyrus desiring to render justice unto the virtue of this illustrious Scythian, he presented him unto Mandana, in a most obliging manner, Page 222 and in few words acquainted her with the merit of this excellent man. This Princess also did him all imaginable honour, and rendered as much unto his vertue, as unto his quality, which was great.

Since the Fort of the Saumates was in their way, and a convenient dayes journey, all the Princesses did lye there, and were received by the King of Hircania, who was well recovered of his wounds, and able to meet Cyrus and Mandana at their entrance into the Fort, making many excuses that he came no further to meet them: After which he told Cyrus, that he would give him more than a Kingdome, if he would be pleased to render him what hee had lost, and what so few ever knew that he had. This discourse is so dark unto me (replied Cyrus) that I cannot return an answer before you inform me what it is which you have lost, and which I can restore unto you. When you are in a more fitting place, Sir, to tell it in (replied the King of Hircania) I shall more precisely tell you, how I am this morning assured that I have a sonne in your Army, though none ever thought that ever I had a successor, or was ever married: And therefore Sir, when I have cleared unto you some circumstances which I shall this day know, I shall beseech you to restore him unto me.

You may well imagine Sir (replied Cyrus) that I should be very glad if I could contribute any thing unto your satisfaction: You Sir, I say who was the first that came in to my side, and unto whom my first acknowledgments are due: After this, the King of Hircania returning a civill answer, without particularizing any thing of his adventure, Mandana was ready to come out of her Coach, and Cyrus left him to go and present his hand unto her. All the rest of the Princes did the like unto the Princesses whom they adored: But Arpasia having two adorers who would equally strive for that office, they were ready to quarrell about it: And if Arpasia had not wisely carryed her selfe, doubtlesse they had faine foule upon one another.

In the mean time, Cyrus being advertised of the passage, and understanding that Hydaspes was more in the wrong then Meliantes, he drew him apart: And after he had told him how he did not take it well that he should no better comply with a man unto whom he was so much obliged, and unto whom hee might attribute the name of his Protector, he acquitted himselfe of his promise made unto Meliantes, in desiring Hydaspes with all affectionate perswasions, to thinke no more upon Arpasia, but to yeeld her unto his Rivall. Sir (said Hydaspes) I most humbly beseech you, do not command me peremptorily, least I should shame my selfe in my disobedience. But Sir, to testifie how I respect the (...) end of the illustrious Cyrus in the person of my Rivall, I will promise, that if Arpasia make choise of him, and reject me, I will never disturb his enjoyment of her, but will sooner resolve upon death, than molest a man who hath had the glory of doing you such considerable service, and hath obtained your friendship.

Since you believe that Arpasia will prefer you before Meliantes (replied Cyrus) you will in this do nothing which will oblige me. Alas Sir (replied Hydaspes) I am much lesse happy than you do imagine: For since my Rivall hath delivered Arpasia from the hands of Licander, he hath gotten so much of her heart, that I know not which of us hath the greatest share. Since it is to (said Cyrus) me thinks you may the more easily yeeld him your halfe; for I cannot conceive there is any great happinesse to be found in the enjoyment of a divided heart.

However it be, Sir, (replied Hydaspes) I shall loose that satisfaction which I have, and which I cannot voluntarily yeeld. Since it is so (said Cyrus) the Princesse Mandana shall take the paines to negotiate the matter with the faire Arpasia: For I should be exceeding sorry, if any misfortunes should befall unto two men who are so deare unto me. After this, Cyrus went immediately unto Mandana, and entreated her to speak with Arpasia, to the end some course might speedily be taken in the businesse, lest these two Rivals should quarrell about her. Yet first he would talk with Gabrias; who having given unto Cyrus all the power he had over his Daughter, he enabled that Prince to do an act of Justice between these two men whom he exceedingly loved.

In the mean time, Mandana talked with Arpasia in private: and telling her the state of things, also how she was the Mistress of her own destiny, shee was at a Page 223 strange Dilemma. At the first she said that she would refer her self unto the disposition of her Father. But Mandana being very importunate with her to explain her self clearly, she was more puzzled: For truly Madam (said she, being resolved to tell her plainly) I cannot give you any answer, all I can say, is to acquaint you in two words with the condition of my soul, to the end you may, though I cannot well without a blush, that my first inclination was towards Meliantes and that I esteemed him, and was as tender towards him as possibly one could be: I must confesse also, that I was infinitely beholding to him, insomuch as but for him I had married a man whom I did most horribly hate, and should have been consequently the most miserable person upon Earth.

I must further confesse, that I was not sorry he did love me at Alfenes, and that had I never heard of his infidelity unto me, whose name was Argelise; I had loved him again as he desired to be; but for all this Madam, I must also tell you, that being fully resolved to be only upon tears of friendship with Meliantes, I came afterwards acquainted with Hydaspes, whose humour and disposition I found so agreeable unto my own, as at the first I believed there would be a great affection betwixt us: And I must tell you more than ever I did him, that my secret design of dis-engaging my heart from Meliantes, did make me receive the Love of Hydaspes, sooner than otherwise I had done, so as not to dissemble with you, I did permit him to hope, and a while after promised him my Love: Since this Madam, there hath hapned many strange revolutions, and not to insist upon any but the last, I will tell you Madam, that notwithstanding all my coldness to Meliantes, he came disguised unto the Tents Royall, and was so generous as to hazard his life in being the death of my last Ravisher, and I may truly say Madam, that in killing Lycander, he hath received part of that affection which formerly I had unto him; so as I am now in the most perplexed condition in the World. For I know, that none can be more perfectly loved than I am both by Meliantes and by Hydaspes. The first of which hath done me the most considerable service, and the second hath the Engagement of my promise, which I am not able to keep unless I be ungratefull unto Meliantes, nor can I bestow my self unto Meliantes, unless I be perfidious unto Hydaspes.

Thus can I give my self unto neither of these two, unless I should grieve for him whose I am not. And I am so unresolved what to do, that doubtless, I should repent it, if I should make my choise of either. For truly, I do no sooner entertain an advantageous thought of Hydaspes, but presently I have another which blasts it: And therefore Madam, to be sincere with you, I am not able to make him whom I shall choose, or my self happy, in my choise.

After this, Mandana endeavoured to discover whether all this proceeded from the reality of her mind, and indeed she did so plainly find that it was so, as she could not choose but wonder.

But the great difficulty was, to make Arpasia consent that her thoughts should be made known unto Meliantes and Hydaspes, yet resolve upon it, she must: For after Mandana had given an account unto Cyrus and Gabrias of her conference; they could find out no better course, then to tell both Meliantes and Hydaspes ingeniously how the case stood. So as sending for them both, Mandana did so discreetly acquaint them with Arpasias mind, and carried the matter with such artifice, as she almost infused an equal desire in them both, to yeeld her unto one another by the impossibility which she made them see in making either themselves or her happy; yet they could not resolve it so upon a sudden, but desired two things. The one, that Arpasia would in their presence confirm all that the Princess Mandana had told them, that they might see there was no possibility of changing her mind The other, that they might have time given them untill the next day before they gave their answer. Their demands were granted, and Arpasia was brought unto them, though much against her will: But when they saw her, they found all that Mandana told them so exactly true, that they equally thought themselves most miserable, yet Meliantes less than Hydaspes: For after an absolute despair, he found some sweetness, in seeing that he had made some Entrance into Arpasias heart, since he had gotten half of it from his Rivall, yet this partition was a great affliction unto him as well as unto Hydaspes, and they were in a hundred minds, to Page 214 give over all thoughts of a person who could not tell what to resolve upon: And thus they passed away that night in a restless perplexity.

However, Meliantes being as generous as amorous, the very thought that Hidaspes would still be in a corner of Arpasias heart, though he should marry her; he was in a mind to quench his flames, but since generosity told him it was against the haire to yeild her unto his Rivall, he was resolved not to do it, when one came to tell him that Cyrus was very desirous to speak with him, and stayed for him in Mandana's chamber, He remembering his promise of giving an answer, did think it was that for which he sent for him; but he was much surprized when in entering into the Chamber of that Princess, where there was only Cyrus and the King of Hyrcania, and he heard Mandana say that she had such good news to tell him, as she desired none should acquaint him with it but her self: For Meliantes (said she unto him) you are Son unto a King, and to a King who was the first friend of Cyrus when he begun the Warr: But the worst is, that in giving a Crown you must loose a mistress; for the King your Father before whom I speak hath acquaint[ed me, that according to the Laws of his Kingdome it is not lawfull for the successor unto that Kingdome to marry a stranger Princess. Madam (replied Meliantes, much amazed) what you are pleased to tell is so far from any probability that not daring but to beleive your words, I must needs think I have not rightly understood them: No, no (replied the King of Hyrcania) neither the Princess Mandana nor you are mistaken; for you are really my Sonn, though you do not know it. And to testifie that I do know all that ever you have done, since you left the name of Clidaris and assumed that of Meliantes, I must tell you that you were brought up in a Province of Assyria, that you were beleived to be Son unto a man of quality there, that you thought Cleonide was your sister, and that you have travell[ed all Greece.

In the mean time those from whom you thought you had your birth, were only the confidants of my marriage with a person whom I espoused secretly during the Life of my Father, and who dyed presently after you were born: But I beseech you Sir (said Cyrus and interrupted him) what is the reason, why after the death of the late King of Hyrcania, you did not declare your marriage & recall home the Prince your Son? The reason of it was Sir, (replied he) that having consulted with the Oracle of Jupiter Belus in Babylon concerning the birth of my son. I was answered that if I did not conceal his quality, untill he had taken the greatest Prince upon Earth Prisoner he should become the most miserable man in the world, and if on the contrary I did not divulge it untill he was master of a Princes destiny who had the destiny of all Asia in his hands, he should be able to cure himself of a passion which then would torment him, and afterwards be very happy all the rest of his days. So in obedience to the Gods, I sent my son to travell into Greece, in expectation of their promises which now are accomplished, since my Son hath had the Glory to see the illustrious Cyrus his prisoner: So as also the man who did educate him, and when the men who did educate him, and when he beleived me to be his Father being come hither to tell me he understood that my son under the name of Meliantes was in the Party of Thomyris, and that he thought it fit to avert him from it, I therefore do know of infallible certainty that Meliantes is my Sonn: But since under that name he hath had the Glory of doing some service unto so great a Prince, I would not have him own any other.

As long as the King of Hyrcania spoke, Meliantes had many different thoughts sometimes he was glad that his birth was as great as his heart, and sometimes when he thought his condition would blast his pretensions unto Arpasia, he was sad.

Thus Love and Ambition struggling in his heart all the while the King of Hyrcania spoke, he knew not whether he should be sad or glad. But as soon as that Prince had done speaking. Nature beginning to prevail with his Soul, he rendred unto the King his Father all possible reverence in the presence of Cyrus and Mandana.

After which, the King of Hyrcania by the permission of Cyrus, caused the man whom Meliantes thought to be his Father, to enter, who confirmed all that he had said. So as it being out of all question, the King of Hyrcania told Meliantes he was very sorry that the Lawes of his Kingdome were against the Lawes of his Love; but for all that, he hoped that a Crown would comfort him for the losse of Page 225 Arpasia. So that without requiring any precise answer, but supposing that he would conform himselfe to the Law, he told Cyrus in a low voyce, that hee was very impatient, untill Meliantes was known unto the world for whom he was, hoping that the Complements and Addresses which would be made unto him upon the advantageous alteration of his condition would vvine its mind from its ordina[r]y object, and hinder him from excessive grief at his losse of Arpasia. So Cyrus beseeching Mandana to let the people enter into her Chamber, the happy adventure of Meliantes was quickly divulged: For the Prince Mazares, Artamus, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and many others came in, and were informed of it. Yet Meliantes, as soon as he could disingage himselfe from the company, and being prieked on by his passion, he went unto the Tent where Arpasia was, who knew already who he was; for Martesia had sent to tell it unto Niside, who told her: therefore she received him as sonne unto the King of Hyrcania, to wit, with much more ceremony, and reverence.

But Meliantes at first perceiving it: No no, Madam (said he unto her) I beseech you do not change your way of behaviour unto me: For if you please, Meliantes will be the very same he was yesterday, since Fortune will needs have it so, that he cannot be both son unto the King of Hyrcania, and Husband unto the fair Arpasia. After this, Meliantes acquainting her how the case stood, he protested that if she would give him her whole heart, he would with joy renounce all pretensions unto the Crown of Hyrcania, and would esteem himselfe much more happy in reigning there, than in a great Kingdome: But Madam (said he most passionately) you must do it in all sincerity and Justice: and consider, that Hydaspes perhaps would not quit a Crown to enjoy you.

Arpasia was now much mooved at the expressions of Meliantes: But being both full of generosity and sincerity, she thought it not fit to dissemble her thoughts, nor to let a Prince so generous loose a Crown, since she saw it as great a difficulty for her to disoblige Hidaspes, as him. But though she vv as as svveet in her expres[sions as possible, as possible, yet he thought himselfe so vvronged, that all these testimonies of his Love should not oblige her vvhole heart, that he protested he vvould never pretend more unto her; and that he vvould do all that ever he could to make ambition supply the place of his love, and vvould never affect any thing but glory, since he could never affect any but her, and since he could not obtain her Love: And accordingly, hee vv ent from her in this mind: and meeting Hidaspes by the vvay, he told him that he vvould yeild Arpasia unto him; and assured him, that though he could never cease being his Rivall, yet he vvould cease all pretentions unto the enjoyment of his Mistresse. Hidaspes received this Declaration vvith so much joy, that Meliantes began to repent: but the anger of his soule coming in [to his reliefe, he did not change his mind; but on the contrary vv as so confirmed, that he hoped vvith time to cure himselfe of his passion, and vvithdrawv his heart from one, vvho could give him but halfe of hers.

In the mean time, Cyrus had his shires in the inquietudes of Meliantes, though he did not shew it: For the Hircanian law, which did forbid the sons of their Kings to marry strange Princesses, was also the Law of the Cappadocians: so as Mandana, as Queen of that Kingdome, could not marry Cyrus. Yet this Prince did conceale his sorrows, and would believe, that as Ciaxares might deny the Princess his daughter as Qu: of Cappadocia, yet he might give her to him as Prin[cesse of Media only. Not that this obstacle was new unto this Prince; but he had so many other more weighty, that he never thought of it, untill the King of Hircania did mention the Law of his Kingdom, and untill Mandana told. Meliantes, that in gaining a Crown, he must loose a Mistresse. However, he dissem[bled his inquietudes, and appeared the next day as pleasant, as possible.

In the mean time, Mandana having a great desire to be on the other side of Araxes, she entreated all the rest of the princesses to rise betimes, so as they went so early, that the Troops could not follow them: But after they had passed over Araxes, and the Army also, the wise Anacharsis who had waited upon Cyrus so farre, did take his leave of him, and carryed In*thyrses away with him. *e[s]iphiles, Cherseas, and Diocles accompanied him, and continued their Travels, as they began.

Page 226 But this wise Scythian, at parting from Cyrus and Mandana, did give them such high Elogies, as they had great reason to be as well satisfied with him, as he with them. As for Indathyrses, he left Cyrus much against his will, as well as the faire Telegenes: and had he thought shee could have left Armenia, to go into the Countrey of the Sauromates, he would not have parted so soon: but he chose ra[th]er to cure himselfe of a growing passion by absence, than vainly augmenting it by his stay.

In the mean time, Cyrus and Mandana continued on their journey; but out of prudence, he would not let the King of Hircania goe unto Ecbatane, for it was apparant, that Meliantes had need to be far from Arpasia, to quench his flames. So as Cyrus making that his pretence, he moved the King of Hircania to go in [to his own Kingdome with the Troops which he brought: And in parting from Meliantes, he gave him such high applaude, inducing him to love glory only, as he had good reason to be well satisfied. Mandana also testified so much esteem of him, and so did all the Princesses and Princes which followed Cyrus, that he had all the reason in the world to be infinitely satisfied. But his greatest satisfaction was to see, that Arpasia at parting did looke so sadly, that Hydaspes was angry at it.

Thus he departed with all the glory that he deserved, and with as much satisfaction as his mind was capable of: For though Arpasia was infinitely amiable, yet every one murmured against her; and though Hydaspes was a man of as excellent parts as any in the world, yet they thought she was injurious in not giving her whole heart unto Meliantes.

However, when Mandana came near Media, Cyrus sent Orders unto Ariarita and all the rest of the women whom he had left with Lycaste, to be at Ecbatane. And that day they entred upon the Frontiers of Medea, Harpagus, and Pactias, who were gone unto Mytelene after the siege of Cumes, because the first durst not shew his face unto Cyrus, and the other unto the King of Lydia, they now returned; and addressing themselves unto Hydaspes they informed him, that in their design of travelling, they embarqued in a ship which a tempest had driven into Mytilene, and that they went afterwards into the Isle of Crete, so famous for the wonderfull Laborinth which is there to be seen: That being there, the shop in which those whom the Prince of Phoeus and Bomilcar had sent unto Cyrus, did there land: So as understanding that they had Letters from that Prince, and were going into a Countrey which was commended for its beauty, they followed them and came to Marseilles, where they saw the admirable Cleonisbe, and were present at her Marriage with the Prince of Phoeus, of whom they spoke all Imaginable good: Adding that not being able to live longer out of their own Countrey, they implored the assistance of Cleonisbe and that Prince; who being glad to meet with an occasion of thanking Cyrus for the happiness which they enjoyed, had writ a Letter of thanks unto him; and in it beseeched him to pardon Harpagus*, and to mediate Cressus for a pardon of Pactias. So as Hydaspes taking upon him that business, he spoke unto Cyrus, who not being able to deny any thing in a time when fortune gave him all things he could hope for, he consented that Hidaspes should present Harpagus unto him, and desired Cressus to pardon Pactias: This Prince being extream glad to heare by them that the admirable Cleonisbe and the valiant Prince of Phoeus were happy together, though he was very sorry this case was not so with the generous Bomilcar.

Afterwards Cyrus took all requisite order for Mandana's arrivall in Ecbatane, in an Equipage proportionable to her quality: And to that end he rested in a little Towne in a Province of Medea, which is called the Province of Sapires. During their stay there, all that Love could invent, which was tender, sweet, and gallant, was used by Cyrus, by Mandana, Intaphernus, the Princesses of Bythinia, Atergatis Istrina, and by Myrsiles. As for Doralisa, she followed her old humors, since certainly tender and passionate expressions were not her custome: all that she was able to do, was to let the Prince Myrsiles use them.

But when all things were ready, both for the Train of Mandana, and the Equipage of Asias Conqueror and for all the rest of the Princes who followed him: This Hero leaving all his Army upon the Frontiers, except only five hundred Page 229 Horse, he advanced towards Ecbatane, where Cyaxares expected them in impatience, proportionable to the joy which he hoped to receive in seeing the Princess his Daughter. But Cyrus and Mandana were pleasingly surprized, when they heard that Cambyses and the Queen his Wife were come unto Ecbatane, the cause of their voyage being unknown unto them.

In the mean time, the day of their triumphant entrance being come, the sight was both unexpressible and unimaginable: And though the King of Assyria had prepared a very magnificent Triumph for the reception of Mandana into Babylon, when the Prince Mazares by that Kings orders presented her with the keys of it; yet it was nothing in comparison of this. The truth is, the Prince Mazares did not contribute any thing unto it; for he made no preparations for it, because he remembered that it was at such a Ceremony that he lost his liberty: So as looking upon Mandana that morning when she had dressed her selfe; Take heed, Madam (said he unto her) lest you should this day make some other as miserable as my self: For you may remember it was at such a Ceremony that I had the misfortune to fall in love with you: I was so sad and miserable that day (replied Mandana and smiled) as it was no wonder your compassion of my misfortunes should mollifie your heart: But since I am this day in a happy condition, I need not feare any such adventure will befall me: And if I have any cause of feare, it is to loose your friendship: Oh Madam! (said Mazares and sighed) did you but know my heart, you would see there was greater danger of my loosing yours, than you mine: and yet I assure you Madam, you cannot deprive me of your friendship, unlesse you be unjust. Then I shall never take away mine (replied Mandana) for it is not my custome to be unjust: so that as long as you keep your self as you are, I shall be sure to be the same I am, and will never change, unlesse you do.

Your expressions Madam (replied Mazares) ought to be received with fullnesse of joy: and though it do not appeare in my eyes, yet my heart is most sensible of it: But Madam, I beseech you pardon an involuntary melancholly which perhaps will appear in my face against my will, since it is the only thing which you shall ever have any cause to chide me for: Since it is so (replied she) I will pity, in lieu of chiding you, but do not think it strange if I never aske you the cause of your sadness. As Mandana said so, one came to tell her that all things were ready for her departure; and presently after, Onesile, the Princess of Bythinia, Istrina, Arpasia, and Telegenes came into her Chamber, and so drest, and so fair, as it was evident that joy is a wonderfull advantage unto beauty. Yet the Princess of Bythinia was in mourning, but so, that her beauty appeared not a jot the lesse.

As for Mandana, she was never so faire as that day: And when Cyrus came into her Chamber to present his hand unto her, and to conduct her unto her Coach, he was so surprized and dazled at her beauty, that he stood a long while gazing, and adoring it: For since he had never seen her so drest, nor so merry, since his departure from Cumes, hee thought her more charming than ever, and hee was more in Love than ever: and by consequence the disquiet of his soule was the greater, though hee did sometimes flatter himself in a belief that it was ill grounded,

At last all the glorious Train departed; The Ladies all in rich Chariots of Triumph, and all the Princes on most excellent Horses, and there was not the meanest servant who had not some marks of his Masters magnificence. When they were within two hundred furlongs of Ecbatane, Ciaxares and Cambyses met them in the head of all the Persians and Medes of quality who followed them, and stayed for them close by a triumphant Arch which they had erected unto the glory of Asia's Conqueror, and Mandana's deliverer, where the Inscriptions and paintings were so ingenuous, as they extolled and represented all the victories of that Prince. But Cyrus being as modest as valiant, he would not passe under this Arch, which they had erected unto his glory, but left that honour unto Mandana as the true cause of all his Conquests.

This interview had all the circumstances which could possibly render it delightfull; for there appeared so much joy in the Countenances of Ciaxares and Cambyses, when they saw Cyrus and Mandana; and Cyrus and Mandana were so Page 230 glad to see them, as they did communicate the same unto all that saw them, so as never was such acclamations upon Earth as then. But being impatient to be in a place where they might talk, they went towards Ecbatane; and all the way there were still new marks of magnificence to be seen either in the troops which were ranked on the right & left hand, or in other triumphant Arches erected to the glory of Cyrus and Mandana, or in the infinite number of men of all qualities, who came far and neer to meet them with Garlands and Crowns of flowers which they presented unto them and cast at their feet in homage to them

At the Gates of the town stood all the Magistrates who made Orations to them: Likewise at the Gates of the Temple were all the Magi of Ecbatane, ready to offer sacrifices of Thanks unto the Gods.

But as soon as all these Kings, these Princes, these Princesses, and men of quality had taken those places in the Temple which were assigned for them, the same accident which hapned in the time of Astiages, did now happen again: For the Temple did shake, the Lamps extinguished, all except one over the head of Cyrus, which burned so clear and full of Lustre, as if all the rest had united their lights unto it.

At the same time also, for a quarter of an hour together, was a noise heard in the vaults of the Temple which resembled thunder, and the roaring of the sea, and which struck fear into the souls of all that heard it. This prodigy did amaze all the assembly; the Magi themselves all except one were were affrighted and so were all except Cyrus, in whose countenance was not the least semblance of fear. When they offered to begin the sacrifice, they could not end it, for all the victims escaped from those who held them, and the Sacrificers assured Ciaxares, and Cambises that of necessity they must defer it til another time, and appeare the Gods unto whom they would sacrifice.

As for Cambises, he did imagin according to the Religion of his Country, that if the Gods were angry, that men should be so bould as to adore them in Temples built with prophane hands. But as for the Magi, that there was something of importance which the Gods would make known unto them by it.

The chief of them who was he which was least amazed, did very well remember the interpretation which was formerly given upon those Lamps which redoubled their light over the head of the Queen of Persia: Sa as imagining that the Gods required this accomplishment of that prediction, he told Ciaxares that he must retire unto his Palace, and that he must give him time to observe the stars, and turn over his books, and to penetrate into the secrets of the Gods; and accordingly all this great company went out of the Temple into the Pallace; but this was sadly resented by the Queen of Persia, and every one talked of this prodigy according to their severall fancies. As for Ciaxares who was most perplexed his reason why the Gods were so angry, was, because he would marry his Daughter against the Laws of the Cappadocean Kingdom, which would not have her marry a stranger Prince So that not being able to keep his fears within the compass of his own heart he told them unto very many, and they became so publick that they were the common talk, and they made such deep impression upon the mind of Ciaxares that he sent Aglatidas unto Babylon in his name to consult with the Oracle of Jupiter Belus. But in the Interim of this voyage, and whilst the Magi were consulting with the stars and their books; Cyrus was extreemly troubled, and Mandana for all her prudence could not choose but be very melancholick. Is it possible (said she unto Martesia) that the destiny of Cyrus should be yet doubtful? can it be that after he hath been imprisoned at Synope for the Love of me, After he hath saved the life of the King my Father in the war against the late King of Pontus, after he hath won two battells in one day, after he had gloriously ended that War, by bringing that King into captivity: After he hath beaten the King of Assyria, taken Babylon, surprized Synope, subdued Armenia, won the battell of Thyburra against Cressus, taken Sardis, put the King of Pontus to flight, after he had delivered me by taking Cumes: after he has vanquished Thomyris and Ariantes, and gloriously brought me home to Ecbatana. Can Cyrus I say, doubt of a recompence for all his Conquests and Travells? he who above all this hath been thought twice to be dead, who was mangled almost in peices after the combate of two hundred, who has received Page 229 severall most dangerous wounds besides in severall Encounters, who hath been prisoner both of War, and State for the Love of me, and who hath given me a million of testimonies of his Love, must he be now slighted? whilst Mandana was thus complaining, and whilst Martesia was comforting her, all the town were at their prayers to appease the Gods.

But at last Aglatidas returned from Babylon, who after he had consulted with the Oracle in the name of Ciaxares, whether he might give his Daughter unto Cyrus, since he was a Persian, and since the Cappadocian Laws did prohibit that Princess to marry a stranger, he was returned this answer.

The Oracle ^{sa}

Out of your thoughts expell

All fears of any danger.

Who can all Asia quell,

In no place is a stranger.

This favourable answer did so rejoyce the hearts of Ciaxares, Cambises, the Queen of Persia, Cyrus, Mandana, and all that heard it; that it may be termed a publick joy; especially because it concurred with the Dooms of the Magi, who rendred an account unto Ciaxares, and Cambises of all their observations before all the Princes in the Court: For the chief of the Magi addressing his speech unto the two Kings, told them a thing which made him the more wonderfull, because it concurred with the secret thoughts of their own souls, although they did not impart them unto any. Sirs (said he unto them) upon a recollection into my memory of things past; and when I think upon that prodigy which hapned, when the Lights of severall Lamps united themselvs unto that which was over the head of the Queen of Persia; after I say a comparison of that with this which wee have seen over the head of the illustrious Cyrus: I examined the interpretation which was then upon it, I have consulted with the most learned books we have, I have seriously observed the stars, I have so cleerly read in Characters of Gold, and light, the will of the Gods, that I cannot make any more doubt of it.

And sir (continued he and looked upon Ciaxares and Cambises) that which the Gods do require of you is, that you refer the the whole cares of your Kindoms upon the Government of the invincible Cyrus, and that you leaving off sovereign authority, he may be the sole sovereign over all Asia, so many Kings as he hath subdued, do teach us that the Gods would have all obey him, and this is the interpretation of all the Lights extinguishing and re-uniting again in one over the head of Cyrus, as those were heretofore over the head of the Queen his Mother: yes, sir I dare assure you, that if you do, as I now say, you will satisfie the Will of the Gods, your sacrifices will be acceptable unto them, and you will see no more prodigies to astonish you.

But on the contrary, you will peaceably enjoy all the pleasures of Life under the shadow of Cyrus his palms and Trophies, you wil reign in his person, and without your being his Subjects, he may yet be the sole Sovereign over all Asia.

Conform your selves therefore unto the Will of Heaven: And that you may both conjunctly reign in the person of this great Prince, make up the marriage immediately between Mandana and him.

This Magi had no sooner done speaking, but Ciaxares and Cambises declared their will, unto him, and told him that they were ready to conform themselves unto the will of the Gods.

The modesty of Cyrus was such, that he refused to accept the sovereign power, which the Kings would have yielded up unto him; but they were so urgent upon him, and the Magi told him so peremptorily that the Gods would have it so, as without any more delay Ciaxares and Cambises made a publick declaration the next day by which they made it known unto all the world that they did voluntarily invest their authorities in the hands of Cyrus, and accordingly the chief of the Magi in Ecbatane in the Presence of all the court, and in the midst of as many people as that Temple was able to hold, did invest him with all the ceremonies and signs of Page 230 Sovereign Authority, that is to say, with a Scepter, a Royall wreath, and all other things which distinguish the Kings of Persia, and the Kings of Medes from other Princes. Ciaxares would have thrown at his feet as many Crowns as he had conquered Kingdoms, and made Tributary Kings: But Cyrus would not have it so, not only out of modesty, but in consideration of Cressus and Myrsiles, whom he highly esteemed and ranked as his friends. The most observable was, that the Sacrifice which was offered after Cyrus was declared King, was very acceptably received: And the Magi assured Cyaxares and Cambyses, that the Gods whom they adored, were never better pleased.

But after this magnificent Ceremony was accomplished, Cyrus had a most impatient desire to see Mandana, that he might offer unto her all the Crowns which he had taken upon him: And disengaging himselfe as soon as he could, he went unto her to tender that Homage, and to assure her that he thought himself more glorious in being her Slave, than in being Master of so many Kingdoms.

In the mean time, the day of Marriage being set downe, nothing was thought upon but preparations for that glorious Ceremony: And Cyrus being a most dear lover of his friends, he thought also of their satisfaction. Therefore hee perswaded the Princesse of Bythinia, who had full power over her selfe, to make Intajphernes happy: As for Gadates; he did voluntarily consent unto it: And Cyrus after that perswaded that Prince to give Istrina unto Atergatis. As for Arpasia, she was in a strange condition: For she did so resent the absence of Meliantes, that Hydaspes was hardly pleased: and she was in many minds to recall Meliantes thought, at the rate of Hydaspes his banishment: and yet she was resolved to marry him, because Gabrias her Father did so command her: But certain it is, she had much ado to carry her selfe between her love, and her friendship, since she neither made herselfe, nor any of her friends happy, for Hydaspes was but half contented, after he had married her.

But when Cyrus went about to satisfie the love of the Prince Myrsiles, he found himselfe a little puzzled, not that Cressus was against the affection of the Prince his sonne: For though the quality of Doralisa was inferiour unto that Prince, yet considering the state of things he did not insist upon it: But the main difficulty was, how Myrsiles should be assured of her Love before he married her; for Doralisa would never confesse it, though those who knew her best, believed that shee did not hate Myrsiles. However, she spoke always either so lightly, or so sharply, or so negligently of it, that none knew well what to think; and which was rare, Cyrus did sooner perswade her to marry Myrsiles, than he could perswade her to confess that she loved him: but after she was resolved upon it, she did this favour unto that Prince in a very pleasant manner: For (said she unto him) I know not why you should complain Sir. 'Tis true, I tell you that I do only esteem you, but it is not that I do no more; but the reason is, because I want words to expresse the thoughts of my heart, and therefore I had rather have you guess at my minde, than down-right tell you what it is.

But at last, after the modesty, and humour of Doralisa together, had made her say yes, and no, unto all the propositions which were made unto her, whether she would marry or not marry; at last she explained her self that she consented to marry the prince Myrsiles: And these foure marriages being resolved upon, it was also resolved that they should be solemnized three days after that of Cyrus, to the end that the joyes of that Court might the longer continue: And certainly that Court was the most glorious that ever was seen, for there were not a man nor woman of any quality in all Medea who was not there. The lovely Amistris also had quitted the solitude wherein she lived, during the absence of her deare Aglatidas, and came to Ecbatane, whereof she was still one of the greatest Ornaments.

But the day designed for the compleat felicity of Cyrus being come, the Temple where the Ceremony of his Marriage was to be celebrated, was illuminated with a thousand glorious Lamps: All the streets of Ecbatane were hung with rich Sydonian Tapestry, Arches, Pyramides, Obeliskes, and Garlands were erected and hung up to the glory of Cyrus and Mandana, all between the Palace and the Temple, whose Inscriptions being a mixture of Love and War, did embleme as well the grandure of his passion, as the grandure of his Conquests. Most admirable Page 231 Musique made the Roof of the Temple echo all the while of the Ceremony: Never vvere seen so many Kings and Princes in one place, us <◇> that: and ne\ver did a Royall Chaplet become any head so well, as that of Cyrus.

As for Mandana, the Majesty of her deportment vvas such, as vvould have been an Ornament unto the vvhole World: And her beauty appeared so splen|dent that day, as she eclipsed all the rest of the Ladies, as much as the deportment, the spirit, the valour, and the virtue of Cyrus did surpass• the merits of all other men upon earth. Both of them vvere the objects of admiration unto all <◇> vvho be held them upon that stately Throne vvhich vvvas erected in the middle of the Temple: Yet this Ceremony vvvas not honoured vvith the presence of the Prince Mazares; for he finding his soule not resolute enough to behold the felicity of his Rivall, he returned into his own Countrey the night before the Marriage of Cyrus: but before he went, he left one Letter for Cyrus, and another for Mandana, in which he used such noble expressions of himselfe, as did so double the esteem which they had of him, that could he have seen their thoughts, hee had been well satisfied. Indeed he did very well deserve their esteem; for he asked them pardon for his weaknesse, he assured Mandana that he would never •rry; he told Cyrus, that since he was never like to have an Heir, he intended that all his Subjects hereafter should become his, to the end Mandana might reign over the Saces, as well as in his heart.

Yet their sorrows for the departure of Mazares did not hinder, but that they esteemed themselves infinitely happy, in that the Gods had made their Fortunes inseparable, and that they had tyed such an indissoluble knot, which nothing but death could unty. The three dayes after this great Ceremony were spent in Feasts and Jollitie: and the fourth was the Marriage of Myrsiles, Intaphernes, Atergatis, and Hidaspes celebrated, and for a whole moneth after, there was no|thing but publique rejoycings, and diversions in this great Court.

Cyrus had then information that Thomyris was returned unto the Tents Royal, and that Agathyrse had possessed himselfe of Issidon, whilst Thomyris was so sunk in sorrow, that all the Massagetans were preparing to dis-inthroner her, and that Elibesis was become a Subject unto him, unto whom she had been unfaithfull, in hopes of being a Queen.

After this, Cyrus received Deputations from all the Kingdoms which he had Conquered: from all the principall Cities which were under his obedience, and from all the Princes who were his Tributaries; from Babylon, from Susa, from Sardis, Ephesus Cumes, Sinope, Themiseire, Artaxates, Apamea, Gnide, & mothers, he received Homage. Those who were risen against Arsamones, sent also their Deputies to offer unto him the Crowns of Pontus and Bythia: Also he had par|ticular Deputies from Heraclea and Chrysopolis. The King of Phrygia sent unto him his Embassadors with rich Presents: The Queen Tarina, Mother of Mazares did the like: The Prince of Cilicia as much; the King of Armenia the same: The Prince Philoxipe also sent to rejoyce with Cyrus, that the Ora <...> which the Princesse of Salamis had received, was so happily accomplished in his person.

Amasis King of Aegypt, the Prince Sesostris his son, and the faire Thimarette sent to congratulate his Marriage: The Prince Thrasibulus sent his Complements: The King of Hircania, and the Prince Meliantes did the like. Pittacus as much, and all the Sages of Greece writ unto him to testifie their joy, that Fortune had done justice to his virtue.

After all this, Cambyses and the Queen his wife returned unto Persepolis, where they did nothing but devote themselves unto prayers unto the Gods, though Cylrus commanded A•asius whom he sent to command in Persia, to take their Coun|sels in all things. Tygranes and Onesile returned unto Artaxates, admiring the virtue both of Cyrus and Mandana: Silamis their Kinsman followed them. Intaphernes with the Princess of Bythia went unto Chrisipolis with the quality of a tributary King. Atergatis and Istrina followed, Gadates, Hidaspes, and Arpasia went with Gabrias. The Prince Artamas returned unto his dear Palmis: Cressus, Myrsiles, and Doralisa stayed in the Court of Cyrus: The Prince of Paphlagonia married Telegene, and returned into his Country. Chrisantes had the govern|ment of Lydia, Aglatidas that of Babylon, Ligdamis that of Ephesus, and retur|ned towards his deare Cleonice: Araspes that of Cappadocia: Thrasimides that o•Curia, for th• Curians did voluntarily submit themselves unto Cyrus: Feraulas he waited still about his person, and married Martesia a while after: Megabise was sent into part of Arabia, which gave it selfe up unto Cyrus: And this great Prince was so well able to recompence out of the greatnesse of his Conquests, that there was not one of those who had done him any service, which were not fully satisfied with his libera•y. Ciaxares himselfe was well contented to be without Sovereign power, though such an act is seldome unaccompanied with repentance

Thus, this greatest Prince in the World, after he had been the most miserable o <...> all L3370vers, became now the happiest man upon Earth: For he was the possessor <...> the greatest Beauty in all Asia, of the most virtuous person in the whole World, and a person whose great soule transcended the excellency of her beauty, and one who loved him, as well as he loved her. Moreover, his Dominions were bounded on the East with the Red Sea: On the West with the Isle of Cyprus and Aegypt: On the North with the Euxine sea, and on the South by Ethiopia. Againe, he had the advantage to see himselfe Master of all the Treasures of David, Salomon, and Cressus, and he saw himselfe at a higher pitch of glory than ever any other Prince did. Also he enjoyed his pleasures with so much Art, that passing away his Aut|umns at Ecbatane, his Winters at Babylon, his Summers at Susa, it was an eter|nall Spring unto him without the inconveniency either of too much cold, or too much heat. Moreover, this great Prince did with abundance of glory settle such orders in his Dominions, and established such excellent Laws both for War and Peace, that he merits to be proposed as a modell for all ensuing Princes to imitate. And to compleat his felicity, the Heavens did not molest him with the least mis|fortune all the rest of his life: And let both Fortune and Love conspire together to make a man as happy as ever they could, it was impossible they could make him more happy than Cyrus was, ever since the day that he ascended so high a Throne, that all others on the Earth were much below him.

The end of the Tenth and last Part of Cyrus le-Grand. FINIS.
